The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky suggests that the name in this bill should be "Stevens" instead of "Slevens," as read in the bill.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I would say there is nothing before the committee that would suggest that the name should be "Stevens."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In the committee report, I beg to suggest——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I have no objection to changing the name.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In the committee's report it says change the claimant's surname where it appears in the body of the bill to "Stevens" from "Slevens." That is recommended in the report.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. What was that?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. To strike out the language "and pay him a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month." The committee strikes that out, to which I have no objection, but I wished to have it inserted "to pay him a pension at such a rate as the degree of his disability from manual labor may be shown by medical examination which the Secretary of the Interior has caused to be made."

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I will say that the language of the bill itself covers that.

RECONSIDERATION.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the various votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM A. HILDRETH.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the action of the Speaker in signing the bill (H. R. 1330) granting an increase of pension to William A. Hildreth be rescinded and that the bill be returned to the Senate with the request that similar action be taken by the Senate with respect to the signature of the Vice-President, and that the passage of the bill be reconsidered, and that it be postponed indefinitely, the beneficiary of the same being dead.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

REGULATION OF CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6009) to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have not had the time to critically examine this bill as I expected. I do not know that I shall object, but I would like to have a little time to offer an amendment and discuss several features of it.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill has been read to the House——

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will pardon me, I do not think when the bill was up the other day that it was read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the bill has been read. I do not care much about it, but the House is very thin at this time and I know that several Members have serious objection to the bill. It looks to me as if it would be better to have the bill go over until the attendance is better than it is now, at any rate.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill has been given.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know it has, and I am not objecting to its consideration.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I suppose I would be entitled to recognition in my own right in opposition to the bill. I do not want to use an hour.

Mr. MANN. Is not the gentleman willing to take a part of my time?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There might be some one else who would like to discuss the bill. Thirty minutes will be as much time as I care for, and I do not think I will need that.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Texas thinks that there ought to be more opportunity to discuss the bill, I am perfectly willing that it should go over.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would like to have it go over until Monday at least, as I have not had the time to look into it as I would like to.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the House has already given consent for the present consideration of the bill. There is a doubt as to whether the bill has been reported. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that the bill be reported and then it will stand as unfinished business to be taken up on Monday or at any other time.

Mr. MANN. That will be entirely satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when, hereafter, authority is granted by Congress to any persons to construct and maintain a bridge across or over any of the navigable waters of the United States, such bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for its construction, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers for their approval, or until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such bridge and accessory works; and when the plans for any bridge to be constructed under the provisions of this act have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans, either before or after completion of the structure, unless the modification of such plans has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War.

The persons owning or operating any such bridge shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe. If the bridge shall be constructed with a draw, then the draw shall be opened promptly by the persons owning or operating such bridge upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats and other water craft. If tolls shall be charged for the transit over any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act, of engines, cars, street cars, wagons, carriages, vehicles, animals, foot passengers, or other passengers, then the Secretary of War may, at any time, prescribe the reasonable rates of toll for such transit over such bridge, and the rates so prescribed shall be the legal rates and shall be the rates demanded for such transit.

SEC. 4. That any persons who shall fail or refuse to comply with the lawful order of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this act, and any persons who shall be guilty of a violation of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and every month such persons shall remain in default shall be deemed a new offense and subject such persons to additional penalties therefor; and in addition to the penalties above described the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers may, upon refusal of the persons owning or controlling any such bridge and accessory work to comply with any lawful order issued by the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers in regard thereto, cause the removal of such bridge and accessory works as an obstruction to navigation at the expense of the persons owning or controlling such bridge, and suit for such expense may be brought in the name of the United States against such persons, and recovery had for such expenses in any court of competent jurisdiction; and the removal of any structures erected or maintained in violation of the provisions of this act or the order or direction of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers made in pursuance thereof may be enforced by injunction, mandamus, or other summary process, upon application to the circuit court in the district in which such structure may, in whole or in part, exist, and proper proceedings to this end may be instituted under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States at the request of the Chief of Engineers or the Secretary of War; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to navigation created by the construction of any bridge under this act, the cause or question arising may be tried before the circuit court of the United States in any district in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

SEC. 5. That whenever Congress shall hereafter by law authorize the construction of any bridge over or across any of the navigable waters of the United States, and no time for the commencement and completion of such bridge is named in said act, the authority thereby granted shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge authorized in such act be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of the passage of such act.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all bridges which may be built in accordance with the provisions of this act, and the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested in any bridge which shall have been constructed in accordance with its provisions.

SEC. 7. That the word "persons" as used in this act shall be construed to import both the singular and the plural, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a further petition from the same organization, the Civic Center of Washington, relating to the compulsory education of children in the District of Columbia. This organization presents statistics to show that there are six or seven thousand children in the District of Columbia now who are not required to go to the public schools of this city. There is a bill pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia on this subject. They ask that the petition shall be printed as a Senate document, which I trust will be done, but in connection with the matter I want to read a letter from the superintendent of schools of the District of Columbia bearing on this quesion.

I made inquiry of the Commissioners as to whether there are now school facilities for the children who are enrolled, it having come to my attention some years ago that a very large proportion of the children in this District could only get the privilege of attending school one-half day because of the fact that we did not have school buildings enough to accommodate them. The superintendent writes that—

> The reports for October, 1905, show that we have 42 half-day schools of the third grade, 23 of which are white, and 19 colored, with an enrollment of 809 white and 734 colored, making a total of 1,543 pupils.
> The number of half-day schools in grades above the second where it is desirable to have all-day sessions has been steadily reduced during the past five years as new buildings have been occupied, and, in spite of the increasing population, we are in better condition in this respect than we have ever been.

From that letter it appears that now there are 1,543 pupils of the third grade in this District who are denied the privilege of a full day's schooling, and are compelled to accept one-half day. In addition to that, there are the six or seven thousand children who do not attend school; and it is a very serious question whether Congress, notwithstanding the desire of these good people, wants to take the children out of the stores and the manufacturing establishments of the city of Washington, where they are earning something toward supporting their families, and compel them to go to school when we have not any desks for them to occupy.

I move that the petition of the Civic Center be printed as a document, and that the document, when printed, be referred, together with the letter from the superintendent of schools, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. PERKINS on the 23d instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, in style similar to that of the last report of said convention and wrapped for mailing, 600 copies of the Report of the Seventeenth Meeting of the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, being Senate Document No. 105, Fifty-ninth Congress first session.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILLS.

Mr. ELKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, two bills on the same subject, and which are alike, and to ask that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying documents.

Mr. PENROSE. I believe I introduced one of these bills, and I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether both of these measures have been already taken from the Judiciary Committee and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce by order of the Senate.

Mr. ELKINS. I think not. I will make this explanation. In the resolution authorizing the Interstate Commerce Committee to take testimony during the recess of the Senate the subject covered by these two bills was included. The committee accordingly took testimony on that subject, and I have accompanied with the bills the testimony taken in part, and we have further testimony which we will send down to the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on Interstate Commerce was of the opinion unanimously that the subject belongs to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not quite understand the order of the Senate in the sense placed upon it by the Senator from West Virginia. I understood that the Senate simply made an order that the bill was improperly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and properly belongs to the Interstate Commerce Committee. So it seems to me rather an unusual and extraordinary proceeding for the Senate to take a bill from one committee for the purpose of referring it to another committee with the object of taking testimony on the measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to inquire what the bills relate to.

Mr. PENROSE. They are known as employers' liability bills. One of them was introduced by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and the other was introduced by me. They are both on similar lines. If it is the practice of the Senate to take a bill from one committee and refer it to another committee for the purpose of taking testimony thereon, then I have much to learn about the practice of the Senate. But if the Interstate Commerce Committee desires to avoid its responsibility in the consideration of this measure and to refer the bills back to the committee from which they have already been formally taken by the Senate, then it seems to me it is time for the Senate to pause and consider whether the bills can fairly be permitted to be taken from one committee to another without any prospect of definite action from either.

I ask the Senator from West Virginia to permit his request to go over until to-morrow, so that we can ascertain just what was the order of the Senate in reference to these bills. Surely they were not referred to the committee of which the distinguished Senator is chairman simply for the purpose of relieving the Judiciary Committee of the labor and responsibility of taking testimony.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, this is the first time I have heard that these two bills were ever before the Committee on the Judiciary. It is quite new to me.

Mr. PENROSE. That is my information, Mr. President.

Mr. ELKINS. They came to us, if the Senator will allow me, as original bills, introduced by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Pennsylvania. The subject-matter of the two bills was covered in the resolution, and it was investigated and we took testimony; and I tried to accompany the testimony taken in print with the motion I made. It was the judgment of the committee that these bills and this subject belong to the Judiciary Committee. I do not think the committee had any knowledge whatever of the bills having ever been before the Judiciary Committee.

I quite willingly consent to the suggestion that the matter may go over until the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senate are better informed on the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. My attention was only called to the fact a few moments ago that this action was contemplated, and I certainly thought I received the information that the bills had been taken from the Judiciary Committee and transferred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. I am not certain that I am correct, and that is the reason why I should like to have the matter go over until it can be thoroughly examined.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion of the Senator from West Virginia——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply rose to ask the Senator from West Virginia if it is not a fact that practically the same bills were introduced at a previous session and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on the Judiciary asked to be relieved from the further consideration of the bills and have them referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce? Was not that done at a previous session?

Mr. ELKINS. I have no remembrance of the fact. I do not think that was the action taken.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Did not the bills come to your committee in that way?

Mr. ELKINS. No; the bills came to the Interstate Commerce Committee as bills introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to inquire simply what is the request before the Senate? I did not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657 and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from West Virginia assents to the request that his motion may lie over until to-morrow, and without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would suggest, Mr. President, the record ought to show what the facts are in this interesting matter, and between now and the time the request of the Senator comes up for consideration to-morrow the record should be looked into. Certainly it is an important thing, if a bill has been referred to one committee, and then that committee asks to be relieved from it and have it referred to another committee and that is done, and then that committee asks to have it referred back to the first one. Are reports of committees in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of standing and select committees are now in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BEVERIDGE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. Mr. TILLMAN. I suppose it would come under the order of petitions and memorials, as it is somewhat of their nature, but I will ask leave out of order to have read a communication from the Red Rock Fuel Company, which will explain itself. It relates to the railway-rate matter and railroad regulation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the communication sent to the Secretary's desk by him be read. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from South Carolina let it go over until we are through with our reports of committees?

Mr. TILLMAN. This matter has already gone over, and the farther we get away from it——

Mr. SCOTT. I object to its reading now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia objects.

RAILROAD RATE REGULATION.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I objected a few moments ago to the reading of a paper offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I withdraw my objection to the reading of that paper, if the Senator desires to present it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Caroline desire that the paper shall be read, the objection being withdrawn?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am in no special hurry. As this is a matter in regard to West Virginia railroad management—I came near saying of outrageous and tyrannical action there—the Senator coming from that State, his attitude of objection might be misunderstood. I rose, however, for an entirely different purpose. I will send the paper to the desk and ask to have it read. It will explain itself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Red Rock Fuel Company; Fairmont gas and steam coal; mines at Buckhannon, Upshur County, W. Va.]

OFFICE OF LOGAN M. BULLITT, PRESIDENT,
Torresdale, Philadelphia, January 23, 1906.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Red Rock Fuel Company is the owner of over 4,000 acres of valuable coal lands on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in Upshur County, W. Va., which it is endeavoring to develop. In pursuance of this purpose it has opened its mine, constructed a tipple, and built a side track from the tipple to the right of way of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad (some 4,000 feet), and is in a position to make large shipments of coal if it receives the same treatment that the Baltimore and Ohio accords to other shippers of coal on its line of railroad, viz, a connection between the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and its side track.

Nearly one year ago the Red Rock Fuel Company made an application to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for such connection, agreeing to pay the entire cost of the same, and pointing out that it had been the practice of the railroad for years to furnish such connections to persons or corporations desiring to ship coal from lands adjacent to its lines on the terms offered by the Red Rock Fuel Company.

This request was met by a prompt refusal by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and with a further statement that it would not grant the connection requested nor permit the Red Rock Fuel Company to become a shipper of coal if it could prevent it, on the ground that it (the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company) had more coal for transportation than it had facilities to carry it; but the real reason, as found by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as hereinafter set forth, was that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company owned a controlling interest in various coal companies along its line of railroad, which companies ship the bulk of the coal mined along its lines, and that it did not propose to have the Red Rock Fuel Company or any other concern compete with it for business.

Proceedings were commenced by the Red Rock Fuel Company before the Interstate Commerce Commission last May to require the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to furnish the desired connection. These proceedings resulted in a decision in favor of the Red Rock Fuel Company in an opinion handed down on November 25, and, founded on this, an order was entered by the Commission requiring the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to desist from discriminating against the Red Rock Fuel Company in favor of other shippers and in favor of itself or to furnish the connection for the Red Rock Fuel Company by December 23, 1905. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has failed to comply with this order and has announced its intention to disregard it.

During the proceedings it developed that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company controls the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and that it has an interest in limiting the shipments of coal from the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, so as to prevent competition with coal mines on the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

While the injury done in this case is only a private one to the Red Rock Fuel Company, yet it is such an abuse of railway franchises and such a perfectly clear-cut example of injustice on the part of a public servant, with no extenuating circumstances to becloud the main issue, that the Red Rock Fuel Company takes the liberty of inclosing you a copy of the Interstate Commerce Commission's decision in this matter, together with a very brief extract from the testimony taken during the hearing, touching upon the most important statements above made, with the hope that you will give it your attention.

Therefore your earnest consideration of the facts of this case is asked, not only in the interest of the Red Rock Fuel Company, but also in the interest of all independent coal shippers who have no railroad influence and the public generally, who have felt the oppressive force of railway abuses of a similar character, but whose cases, perhaps, are not susceptible of as clear and certain demonstration as this one, and your aid is respectfully invited to making such acts of oppression hereafter impossible.

A full investigation should be had of all the bituminous-coal-carrying railroads reaching Atlantic ports and their relation to each other, and especially the question of whether they are interested in coal properties as well as serving the public as carriers.

Should you desire any further information in regard to this matter it will be cheerfully furnished.

RED ROCK FUEL COMPANY,
LOGAN M. BULLITT, President.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to state that in making objection this morning to the reading of the paper referred to by the Senator it was not because I had any objection whatever to the reading of the paper, but it was because the order of reports of committees had not been concluded; we were in the midst of the transaction of morning business, and a number of us were desirous of temporarily leaving the Senate Chamber. For those reasons I objected to the reading of the paper at that time. I want to make it clear that I do not object at all to having that paper read and having the matter fully and freely discussed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, to complete the statement of facts as to the present situation, I should like to have read the finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission and its order in the premises. I will not ask that the testimony be read, but simply the result of the investigation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

At a general session of the Interstate Commerce Commission, held at its office in Washington, D. C., on the 25th day of November A. D. 1905.

Present: Hon. Martin A. Knapp, chairman; Hon. Judson C. Clements, Hon. Charles A. Prouty, Hon. Joseph W. Fifer, Commissioners.

RED ROCK FUEL COMPANY V. BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

This case being at issue upon complaint and answer on file, and having been duly investigated and submitted by the parties, and the Commission having, on the date hereof, made and filed a report and opinion herein containing its findings of fact and conclusions thereon, which said report and opinion is hereby referred to and made a part of this order,

It is ordered, That the defendant, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company, be, and is hereby, notified and required to wholly cease and desist on or before the 23d of December, 1905, and continuously thereafter, from subjecting complainant to undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage, and from giving undue and unreasonable preference and advantage to other operators of coal mines in the Fairmont coal district of West Virginia and shippers of coal therefrom, or to itself, by refusing to allow at a designated proper point between Lorentz and Buckhannon, in the State of West Virginia, on a line of railroad operated by it in the Fairmont coal district of West Virginia, a side-track connection by means of which complainant may deliver from a side track between its adjacent coal mine and said line of railroad carloads of coal to defendant for shipment and carriage to interstate destinations, while said defendant has granted, and is continuing to allow and maintain, side-track connections for other mines in said Fairmont coal district situated, as compared with complainant's mine, similarly in essential respects for the purpose of shipping coal over defendant's line or lines as interstate traffic, which said discriminating action is found and declared in and by said report and opinion of the Commission to be in violation of section 3 of the act to regulate commerce.

And it is further ordered, That a notice embodying this order be forthwith sent to the defendant corporation, together with a copy of the report and opinion of the Commission herein, in conformity with the provisions of the fifteenth section of the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to do more than make two or three brief comments on these remarkable documents. In the first place, I want to remark that the relief sought here would appear to be obtainable under State law, and if there be none, then West Virginia stands disgraced because she has not enacted such a law. In other words, both of these railroads being within the State of West Virginia—that is, the Baltimore and Ohio running through that State and this little spur being within its borders—are certainly under the jurisdiction of the legislature of West Virginia, and if there is no law there to compel the connection——

Mr. ELKINS. There is such a law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, then, why is the law not enforced? The Senator from West Virginia on my right [Mr. ELKINS] says that there is such a law. I want to know why it is not enforced.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, why the law is not enforced I do not know. I can not say why it has not been enforced, but the law is plain as to the connection between railroads. It could be enforced by mandamus, I suppose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will merely call the Senator's attention to what appears to be a very plain remedy. It seems that these people who desired to engage in interstate commerce, endeavoring to furnish coal for shipment out of the State, have been cut off by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and refused all access to the market.

There is a further statement that the order of the Commission, which is based upon the act to regulate commerce, has been flagrantly disobeyed, and while I presume there has been an order made by the Commission, we see how weak the Commission is, or else these persons would not come to us here, but the aggrieved parties would go into the courts and get redress.

There is a still further statement in that letter, which I think should require the strictest scrutiny and inquiry, and that is to the effect that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is controlled by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. This some of us have suspected for a good while; and it would seem to me that it was about time for an inquiry to be instituted in some Department of this Government—the Department of Justice, I suppose—to ascertain why there is not a suit brought to annul any control by the Pennsylvania Railroad of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which is a competing line with the Pennsylvania. In other words, is this not another parallel case to the Hill litigation, the Northern Securities Company case? I do not know but what it would be well, in pursuing this subject, to try to get the Senate to pass a resolution inquiring of the Attorney-General what is the status of this matter and whether or not the Department of Justice has undertaken, or will undertake, an inquiry into the facts, with a view to action. These people state in this investigation that it has been determined that that is a fact. If it is, it is a very interesting fact, which we certainly ought to know.

As for the general proposition—that is, that railways shall own coal mines, or, as they do now in many instances, prevent private citizens from using the facilities of commerce to compete with them—that already is a flagrant and outrageous situation in the anthracite region in the State of Pennsylvania, contrary to its constitution, as I understand; and if we are to sit quietly and allow the bituminous coal output to be regulated by the greed of the millionaires or multimillionaires who control the railways, it looks to me as if we were getting very near to the point where the tyranny of the corporations will grow unbearable. All this merely points to the necessity for some early action which will grant relief to the people in all matters relating to railroad transportation.

CHINESE BOYCOTT OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further resolutions, concurrent or other, the morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 25th instant, as follows:

Whereas the boycott of American manufactured products by the people of China is a matter of very serious and deep concern to the capitalists and laborers interested in those industries; and

Whereas it is understood that the former United States minister, Wu Ting Fang, is a leader of this movement among his countrymen, assigning as a reason therefor the outrages and indignities put upon Chinest travelers and students under our immigration laws, and through the unwise and drastic methods which have been followed in executing these laws; and

Whereas the policy thus stigmatized by the Chinese is not such as shoud be followed by one great nation in dealing with another; and

Whereas it is in the interest of our commercial expansion and growth that the just complaints of the Chinese people should be carefully investigated and the whole subject presented to Congress for its guidance and information: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Immigration shall consider and, after thorough investigation, report to the Senate the facts in the case and suggest any remedies that may be deemed advisable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, has that resolution just been introduced?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; it is a resolution which has come over from a previous day.

Mr. TELLER. There are some statements contained in the resolution that I should myself very much dislike to agree to. If in order, I wish simply to enter my declaration that I do not believe they are true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator be kind enough to indicate what statements he thinks are untrue? Here is the resolution [handing the resolution to Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. I can not indicate except in a general way. I have had no opportunity to see the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Probably the resolution had better be again read, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. Is the resolution printed?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and here is a copy of it.

Mr. TELLER. I have no disposition to interfere with any inquiry which may be desired, but I do not think we should commit the Senate to any declaration of facts such as seems to be contained in the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to make a suggestion. I think with the Senator, that this is a subject that ought to be investigated, and it is a subject of very great importance.

Mr. TILLMAN. I so consider it.

Mr. LODGE. But it seems to me it would be just as well to omit the somewhat comprehensive declaration of fact in the preamble of the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. If the preamble is stricken out, I have no objection to the resolution itself. If it is understood that this is only a declaration that certain facts are alleged, that some people somewhere claim these statements to be true, then I should have no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is all I tried to say. I may have been unfortunate in my selection of words. I drew the resolution hurriedly, but I am perfectly willing to have it amended to suit the supersensitive ideas of Senators, though I think the President's own message, together with the report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration, bear out every assertion that I make in the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object to the Senator's assertions, but those are the very things we desire to investigate. The Senator says that it is understood the former minister from China, Mr. Wu Ting Fang, is a leader in that movement. I understand that he explicitly denies that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have seen it stated fifty times and have never seen it denied once.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that it has been denied by him.

Mr. BACON. If agreeable to the Senator, I suggest that he strike out the words I have marked in the resolution and insert the word "alleged."

Mr. TILLMAN. All right; put in the word "alleged." That is a legal phrase which will suit you gentlemen.

Mr. BACON. Merely omit the words I have indicated.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Georgia suggests that I strike out the words "understood that the former United States minister, Wu Ting Fang, is a leader of this movement among his countrymen, assigning," and insert the word "alleged;" so that it will read:

Whereas it is alleged as a reason therefor, etc.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that Wu Ting Fang has explicitly denied that he has been guilty of such conduct as that alleged in the resolution. He has made that denial explicitly to me in private conversation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. If it is true that a minister accredited to this country has been taking the course indicated, it seems to me that is one of the cases were he ought to be simply returned to his own country.

Mr. TILLMAN. The resolution refers to the old man, the former minister, whom we all liked so much when he was over here.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know, but I understand——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am talking about the man who has been recalled, the man who is now in China. I want to know when my friend the Senator from Wyoming had the pleasure of conversing with him, and where.

Mr. LODGE. Last summer.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I forgot that the Senator from Wyoming had been in the East.

Mr. WARREN. I have stated simply what Wu Ting Fang said to me with a great deal of earnestness, and I have no reason to believe he was not telling the truth.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not. I would not for a moment suspect him of that, or the Senator from Wyoming of misrepresenting him. I merely wanted to know when it occurred; that is all.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can accomplish everything he desires without the preamble. That is a delicate sort of a preamble. I think he ought to drop the preamble out of the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know that this preamble is so—I will not say unparliamentary, because it is not; I will not say undiplomatic, because it is not, to my mind. I will read here, however, a couple of extracts from the message of the President, and see if they do not go as far as anything I have said. I read them hurriedly. He says:

But in the effort to carry out the policy of excluding Chinese laborers, Chinese coolies, grave injustice and wrong have been done by this nation to the people of China, and therefore ultimately to this nation itself. Chinese students, business and professional men of all kinds—not only merchants, but bankers, doctors, manufacturers, professors, travelers, and the like—should be encouraged to come here and treated on precisely the same footing that we treat students, business men, travelers, and the like of other nations.

That is all I am asking. I have understood that there have been requirements under the immigration law, or the rules established by the Immigration Bureau, that every Chinaman who comes here, whatever he may claim to be his purpose or business, and to whatever class he may claim to belong, shall have three photographs made of himself, and that he has to be measured by the Bertillon system, and all that kind of outrageous invasion of private rights.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to call attention to the fact that the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina simply sets forth the grievances of the Chinese, and merely recites the complaint made by the former minister. It does not——

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from Wyoming said the former minister has denied it. I have heard the minister in speeches right here in this city make practically the same complaint, and I never will forget the emphasis that he used in uttering that great Latin word "atrocious." Almost anybody who heard him speak can recall the emphasis and the way his mustache fairly got four or five additional kinks or curls in it when he alluded to the indignities and outrages put upon his countrymen.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to say to the Senator that I did not intend to say anything against his resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know that.

Mr. CLAY. I think it is proper. It simply sets forth the grievances of the Chinese Government and asks that they be investigated. That is all there is in the preamble of the resolution. I think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read further from the President's message:

But we must treat the Chinese student, traveler, and business man in a spirit of the broadest justice and courtesy if we expect similar treatment to be accorded to our own people of similar rank who go to China. Much trouble has come during the past summer from the organized boycott against American goods which has been started in China. The main factor in producing this boycott has been the resentment felt by the students and business people of China, by all the Chinese leaders, against the harshness of our law toward educated Chinamen of the professional and business classes.

Mr. President, it does seem to me we are getting very squeamish, and, as I said a moment ago, a little supersensitive when we undertake to deny in a preamble facts that are acknowledged practically by the President himself; and I do not see why the Senate, which has the power to investigate and to legislate, or at least to endeavor to legislate by the introduction of a bill and passing it here, should hesitate for one moment to try to do justice in this case. The people down my way are very deeply interested in it. We have a large market in China for our manufactured cotton goods, and there are there millions, scores of millions, of dollars invested in cotton mills whose entire output goes to China; and the trade was growing very rapidly, notwithstanding we have no protective tariff on it. We were competing with Germany and England in the open markets of the world without any butter on our backs, as New England and other parts of the country seem to require.

But since this boycott agitation over there broke out there is a kind of a shiver of dissatisfaction in China, and overt acts of aggressive self-defense, and our people are deeply concerned to have this matter investigated, and let us do justice if we have been doing wrong. That is all there is to it. I hope the resolution will go through, striking out the words:

It is understood that the former United States minister, Wu Ting Fang, is a leader of this movement among his countrymen.

So that it will read:

Whereas it is alleged as a reason therefor the outrages and indignities put upon Chinese travelers and students, etc.

As Mr. Fang has informed the Senator from Wyoming that he is entirely innocent of any personal leadership in that respect, I do not wish to bring him in as a part of the exhibits in this case.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to voting for this resolution, but I am not going to vote for it on the assumption that it states facts. I think an investigation will prove that the statements which are made in regard to the treatment of Chinese who come over here are not true. In a very few cases bona fide students have been badly treated by our officials. These are rare exceptions, however.

I do not see him in the Chamber at present, but I have talked with a United States Senator, who was a United States attorney, and I have talked with a Member of the other House, who was an assistant United States attorney, and I have made investigation pretty thoroughly, and I find that coolies come here often under the guise of merchants. Often consuls abroad grant a cooly a certificate that he is a merchant. It is done in this way: Two bona fide merchants of Shanghai, we will say, go to the American consul there, having with them a cooly. The Chinese merchants swear that the cooly has $10,000 invested in their business; that he is a partner in the mercantile business with them. The consul grants the cooly a certificate that he is a merchant; and it has been stated so broadly that I will restate it—it is charged that the consuls receive anywhere from two to three hundred dollars apiece for the certificates. If a consul issues only a thousand of them a year he is doing pretty well.

Now, when that cooly arrives at one of our ports he is held up by our officers. They find that his hands are calloused, that his shoulders are calloused where he has been carrying burdens under a bamboo pole; and after an investigation and after questioning him they soon discover that he is a cooly, and they send him back to China.

This boycott is not on account of the treatment which we accord to Chinese merchants and students. The boycott is damaging practically in the Cantonese district alone. It amounts to nothing to speak of in northern China, where the students come from. I was in Canton not a great while ago, and when our party arrived in Hongkong we were informed that it would be dangerous for us to go to Canton, up the river a little way; that the boycott was in full force, and we would be insulted; and it being more or less of an official party, that our country might be drawn into a very disagreeable contention with China, which might lead to war. We were warned not to go to Canton at all on account of the boycott. The walls of Canton were placarded with posters ridiculing the Americans. The feeling was very intense against Americans on the part of the coolies.

However, we went to Canton, and, although we did not discover from the Chinese who entertained us the cause of the boycott, some of us did discover the cause of it. A few of us met the representatives of American interests there, and they gave us a statement in regard to the boycott. All the guilds in the Cantonese district, which are the powerful organizations there, more powerful than our labor organizations, united in demanding the admission of the Chinese cooly to the United States. Otherwise there would be a boycott. It is not on account of the merchants and students. They proved these things to us. Every one of those merchants—every American merchant there—agreed as to the cause of the boycott.

The representatives of the British and American Tobacco Company—we met in their offices—said they had lost some 40 per cent of their trade on account of the boycott, and the loss was continuing. We asked them who were the beneficiaries, and they said the Japanese. The Japanese Government has a monopoly of the tobacco industry, and as our merchants go out of business the Japanese take their places. The people with whom we talked would not say they thought the Japanese were behind the boycott, but that is the easy inference.

We asked them why the Cantonese people, or those in that district, were so anxious to have the Chinese cooly come to the United States. They said because all the coolies in the United States are from the Canton district. That is not literally true, but 90 per cent at least of the Chinamen in the United States come from that district alone and most of them from Canton, and they send back to that district some $25,000,000 a year to their merchants and to their people; and those remaining there argue that if more Chinese coolies came here from the Cantonese district, just so many times $25,000,000 a year would go back to Canton and to that district, and $25,000,000 is an enormous sum in China.

Now, the viceroy sympathizes with this boycott. He pays no attention to orders from Peking. The Peking Government can not enforce its demands. The central government is not strong enough there. It dare not remove the viceroy, because he is as strong as, if not stronger than, the Government, and he cares more for the people of the Cantonese district than he does for an order from Peking.

Our people, on the other hand, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, are not very much concerned to have Chinese coolies come here. I have heard it intimated that the southern people would like to have them as an offset to the negro people. If the Chinese are to come, I earnestly hope they will be landed in New York or in New Orleans and let them work their way west or south, as the case may be, and not let them land on our coast and work east.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Idaho is mistaken in his statement about the people of the South desiring this class of help to come in competition with the negro. I never heard the question discussed in my State in my life. The people of my State, and I believe the people of the South, are anxious to be on cordial relations with the people of China, and they are anxious to have business with them and to treat them properly; but I have never heard such a question discussed in my State in my life.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should have said "some southern people." I did not intend to make it so broad, because I know that generally the southern people occupy the position we do in regard to the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to disclaim the slightest purpose or desire along that line on the part of everybody I know anything about in the South. We have troubles enough of our own on account of the present condition without undertaking to mix it up or get "confusion worse confounded" by another element of labor which we consider more or less debased, or something like that. We do not want any coolies.

Mr. DUBOIS. I know there is not a representative from the South in this Chamber who desires it. But I say I have heard the argument advanced by southern men. What I desired chiefly to say was that, in my judgment, we are not going to stop the boycott by throwing bouquets at merchants and students. That is not the cause for the boycott, and the boycott will continue unless we admit the coolies, or unless this Government stands firm and does not undertake to pander to the boycotters and apologize for the rigid enforcement of our exclusion laws.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am not at all supersensitive about the Chinese question. I have faced the Chinese question as very few men on this floor have. I think I perhaps ought to except the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has had some experience in this line directly. I know something about the cooly Chinamen, and I believe the statement made by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] is absolutely true. It is not a demand for the students or the merchants. It is a demand for the coolies. This demand is not made by the Chinamen alone. It is made by a great interest in this country and that interest makes the demand, in the first instance, because of the high price of labor here, and, in the second instance, the scarcity of labor in the United States.

In every community in the West there is a paucity of labor. In my own State there are communities which suffer for want of the proper number of laborers who can be hired by the day or by the month. We have in Colorado a very large mining population, and I want to say here now that the mining population is not concerned about the introduction of cooly Chinese. There is not a Chinaman in the mines in Colorado, and there never will be one in the mines in Colorado; and I might, I think, apply that pretty much to all the West, except in the few instances where placer mines originally, years ago, were worked by Chinamen. I know of none now that are being worked by Chinamen. There may be a few in California, but if there are they are mines in which white men decline to work.

There is not anywhere probably a country where there is such a wide difference between the labor of the country and what you may call the "business men" of the country as there is in China. The average Chinese merchant is a man of Chinese education. The Chinese student is a student in Chinese circles. Hundreds of them have come to the United States and have completed an English education in some of the highest institutions in this country. They go home, notwithstanding that education, and they are still Chinamen and ever will be. There can be no assimilation between a Chinaman and an American citizen.

In the first place, the American citizen will not, except in rare instances, either socially or otherwise, have much to do with the Chinaman, and a Chinaman who has been educated thinks himself of the first class and looks down with contempt upon the average American, no matter though he may be his associate in a college of the country. There may be exceptions and always will be, but we can not afford to allow Chinese labor to come here, and while it is barely possible that there has been such maladministration of the statutes as complained of, I do not myself believe it. If there has been, it is not here that the remedy should be sought, but it is in the executive department of the Government. That occasionally a Chinaman who is entitled to come in under the law may be excluded I have not the slightest doubt. I will venture to say, however, from my own observation—and I think I will be supported by all those who have lived in a community that has any considerable number of Chinamen in it—that ten will get in who ought not to be allowed to come in where one will be excluded improperly.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go to any length on this subject, except to say that I believe the laws are now sufficient, and I can not believe that we have agents to enforce those laws who are so cruel and wicked, as is said that they will deliberately turn back those who are entitled to come in.

As to the boycott that is going on, nothing you can do here will prevent it. It is not the coolies who are doing it. It is the higher class. They are crying "China for Chinamen; Asia for the Asiatics." That we will have to meet. We may sell them some cotton cloths now; South Carolina may manufacture some and send them to China, but the day is not very far distant when there will be no market in China for cotton goods from the United States. There will be Chinese cotton cloths coming here for sale—yards of them, hundreds of yards of them where there will be one yard going the other way.

We are importing from China very much more than we are selling to China. That is true of all Asia. The difference between what we import and what we export will grow greater and greater every year, and the great industrial horde of Japan, in spite of anything you can do here, will seize and control the trade of the 400,000,000 Chinamen. We can not put our American citizens in competition with them, because we can not persuade—nor does anybody desire that we should—our people to come down to the style of living and the condition of the Chinese or the Japanese.

Mr. NEWLANDS obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest, if the Senators who are opposed to the preamble will be satisfied with it, that I will strike out everything except the first "Whereas," so that it will read:

Whereas the boycott of American manufactured products by the people of China is a matter of very serious and deep concern to the capitalists and laborers interested in those industries; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration shall consider and after a thorough investigation report to the Senate the facts in the case, and suggest any remedies that may be deemed advisable; and that it be empowered to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina has a right to modify his resolution as he suggests.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator ought to add "the expense of the investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate;" so that it will read, "it shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, the expenses thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that if the resolution is modified so as to provide for the employment of a stenographer, it will necessarily have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; that is right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to add a word tc what has been said by the Senator from Idaho.

The feeling in China, according to my observation whilst there during the last summer, does not arise so much from the exclusion of the student or merchant class of China as it does from the exclusion of the coolies. The feeling—the intense feeling—displayed in Canton was the intense feeling mainly of the cooly class.

It would be impossible to arouse the great cooly class in China because of the indignities put upon the student or merchant class. The feeling exists there——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will not misconstrue my purpose in asking this question, but how long was the Senator in Canton and Hongkong on his recent visit East?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We were in Hongkong about three or four days, in Canton part of one day, in Peking four days, I think.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the statements and assertions of fact made by the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Idaho, was not their visit somewhat on the same line as Mr. Poultney Bigelow's invasion of the Isthmus? Could you have found out much in regard to this condition in any trustworthy manner in that length of time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Possibly so——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am wholly unbiased. I have no interest in this matter whatever. I do not want any Chinamen down our way, and I am perfectly willing to try to keep the Chinamen away from your country—I mean the undesirable class. But when the assertion is made so broadly that this is a cooly insurrection or cooly uprising against American products, and that the educated and wealthy classes are not concerned, while it may be so, I should like to have it proved by better evidence than that acquired in a mere passing or stop off at Canton and Hongkong and a chat with some interested people there; that is all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say, Mr. President, that I am not opposed to the Senator's resolution, and I understand his purpose, of course, which is to secure friendly trade relations between this country and China, and to remove all misapprehensions. I realize the fact that he does not desire to enlarge the immigration of the cooly class to this country. But I think the Senate is entitled to the information, however meager it may be upon this question, from men who have been in the Orient even for a day or two, and their impressions may add somethng to the general information on the subject.

I state to the Senator that while we were in Hongkong and Canton this uprising against the Chinese-exclusion law was the the subject of the hour, and that we were discussing that question with English merchants and American merchants, and with English officials and American officials and Chinese officials, and that necessarily we got some information upon the subject.

It was intimated that our trip to Canton would be attended with danger. Danger from whom? From the student class? They are a peaceful class. From the merchant class? They are a peaceful class. No; the danger was from the cooly class. It was feared that upon the streets the members of our party would be insulted, that indignities would be put upon them, and that the popular feeling was such that the Chinese officials could not control them.

Now, China is reaching out to some degree of national life. China has not yet been really nationalized. The Imperial Government itself, as the Senator from Idaho says, is not a strong government. The government of the viceroy in each province is comparatively a strong government, and yet the viceroys realize that when the coolies are really aroused they are in a degree powerless. These guilds, these labor organizations, are so powerful there that if an officer were to attempt to carry out an edict which would be prejudicial to their interests they would not hesitate to paralyze the business of an entire city and province. I am told that in the case of unpopular taxes this has been accomplished and the unpopular tax has been withdrawn.

China's national life is increasing every day; the sense of patriotism is increasing there as well as the sense of pride, and I think our difficulties in the Orient are likely to increase instead of to diminish—to increase not because of any fault of ours, but simply because we stand in such a relation to China, facing us on the Pacific Ocean, that we are likely, if the gates are open, to get immigration from that country that no other country would.

The Pacific coast attracts the Chinaman because the climate is suited to him; and the high wages attract him, and the transportation is very cheap. The Chinamen realize what work in this country means, what it means in the way of assisting their families at home, what it means in the way of the accumulation of money, so that they can retire later on upon what may be regarded as a fortune in China. So they fasten their eyes upon this country of all the countries of the world for an immigration movement, and they resent the fact that they should be closed out.

The national life that is now being aroused there will gradually increase their pride. They find that among the great militant powers of the earth, the great commercial powers of the earth, struggling in the Orient for commerce, the United States is the only one of those great powers which excludes the Chinaman. So, necessarily, their unfriendliness to us as compared with other nations will increase, and it will increase notwithstanding both Japan and China are debtors of the United States for most substantial acts of kindness in the past.

The United States has done more to open up Japan to its great career as a civilized power than any other power in the world. It has done more to maintain the integrity of China than any other power in the world. Yet the sense of past obligations will rapidly disappear as they feel the effects of a public sentiment which tends to prevent their people from coming to our country.

If we were to attempt to exclude the Japanese to-morrow—and there is a serious agitation going on in this country with reference to that—we would undoubtedly, if it were successful, have the active hostility of Japan. If we continue the exclusion of the Chinese, as we will continue it, and as we ought to continue it, we will find that the ill feeling of the Chinaman will steadily increase.

In addition to that, we are pursuing a trade policy in the Orient itself which is likely to aggravate these evils, a policy of absolute unfairness in demanding the open door in China, in Manchuria, and in Korea, and elsewhere in the Orient, and at the same time preparing to close the door in the Philippine Islands. It will undoubtedly add to Chinese irritation that we are now in control of legislation in the Philippine Islands and that we are that power to prevent an oriental people from migrating to oriental soil. We have claimed the right, 7,000 miles away from our legislative sphere of legislative control, to legislate for seventeen hundred islands in the Philippine Archipelago and to prevent absolutely the Chinese from landing upon Philippine soil, and we are now also taking steps to prevent them from landing their goods there.

The very purpose of the measure which has recently passed the House, providing for the free entry of Philippine products into this country and the free entry of American products into the Philippines three years hence, at the expiration of the Spanish treaty, is to cut off the trade of Japan and of China with the Philippine Islands, for the effect of it will be to give us a tariff preference of 20 per cent not only over England, Germany, and France, but over the neighbors of the Philippine Islands—China and Japan. This will intensify the feeling of both the Japanese and the Chinese.

We are insisting upon the open door in Manchuria and Korea, and to-day Japan occupies almost precisely the same relation to Manchuria and Korea that we occupy toward the Philippine Islands. Japan has entered into the possession of Korea, insisting upon it that her purpose is to maintain the integrity and the independence of Korea. Notwithstanding that assurance to the Korean people, notwithstanding that assurance to the civilized world, she is exercising absolute domination over Korea, just as we are in the Philippine Islands.

We took possession of the Philippine Islands under a war, a humanitarian war, whose declared purpose was not conquest or acquisition of territory, but the freedom of a people suffering from oppression and wrong. And so under conditions of a similar character we find ourselves in the domination and possession of the Philippine Islands, and Japan finds herself in the domination and possession of Korea.

In addition to that, as to Manchuria, she occupies to-day, by treaty relation with China, substantially the same relation that Russia herself had to Korea, and even a stronger position, and she will largely dominate the trade policy of Manchuria.

So Japan, if she chooses, being the dominant power both in Manchuria and Korea, can close the doors against the trade of the United States, and yet, in order to obtain the monopoly of trade in the Philippine Islands with 7,000,000 people, we are running the risk of forcing Japan in retaliation to close the doors in Korea with its 8,000,000 people and in Manchuria with its 15,000,000 people against our trade, and we are also endangering, by this selfish policy, our trade with the entire Orient, embracing a population of between five and seven hundred million people. To this mistake will be added the mistake of extending our navigation laws to the Philippines, for the express purpose of cutting out the Japanese and other foreign powers from all their present participation in the transportation of the products of the Philippines. The world is now protesting against the trade restrictions upon our domestic soil. Can we extend these restrictions upon foreign trade and preferences to our own to an oriental country now dominated by us without running the risk of oriental retaliation that will restrict our trade in the Orient generally?

It is utterly impossible for us to take a step backward upon the question of Chinese immigration. The mind of the American people is fixed upon that. It is unnecessary to discuss it. You can not find ten men in the Senate and you can not find twenty-five men in the House of Representatives who to-day would vote to relax the laws for the exclusion of Chinese coolies. Is it wise for us to go a step further and in addition to excluding their people practically exclude their goods from territory in the Orient dominated by the American sovereignty?

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I do not want the statement of the Senator from South Carolina to stand as it is. When we got to Hongkong this question was very intense. We were in the midst of the boycott. Speaking for myself, and I presume it was so with the others of the party, representatives of all the American business interests there talked to me in regard to this condition. In addition to that, three of us met a large party of Americans who were affected by the boycott—those who were being hurt and who lived there. They were vitally concerned, and it was from them that we got the information.

We asked them if they expected us to go back and advocate the admission of Chinese coolies in order to raise the boycott? They said:

By no manner of means. We are too good Americans for that. We do not want you to do anything of the sort. We would not have you do it if we could. All that we want to do is to let you understand the causes of the boycott and to ask our Government to stand firm; that is, not to relax their vigilance, but give the Chinese Peking Government to understand that our Government will hold them responsible for any indignities which may arise or any murders which may be committed or riots which may occur.

So it was not a passing visit by any manner of means. These American business men there presented in writing to our party the facts as I have stated them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina as modified.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read. I think it will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the boycott of American manufactured products by the people of China is a matter of very serious and deep concern to the capitalists and laborers interested in those industries: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration shall consider and, after thorough investigation, report to the Senate the facts in the case and suggest any remedies that may be deemed advisable, and that it be authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, and that all expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would state that the resolution as modified will necessarily go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is so referred.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 11543. An act to correct the military record of Benjamin F. Graham was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 12320. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CLAIM OF WILLIAM RADCLIFFE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. FRYE, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

The Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, concerning the claim of the British subject, William Radcliffe, for compensation for the destruction of his fish hatchery and other property at the hands of a mob in Delta, Colo., in the summer of 1901.

I renew the recommendation which I made to the Congress on April 14, 1904, that as an act of equity and comity provision be made for the payment of the sum of $25,000 to Mr. Radcliffe in full settlement of his claim.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1906.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have some amendments to offer to the bill and some observations to make on the bill itself, and two other Senators notified me that they are ready to proceed. But notwithstanding that, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] having given notice that he would address the Senate to-day on a matter which is of importance to his State, I will ask that the unfinished business may be laid temporarily aside until the Senator from Idaho concludes his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report, by the Secretary of Agriculture, of the operations of the Bureau of Animal Industry of that Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1905, in compliance with the requirements of section 11 of the act approved May 29, 1884, for the establishment of that Bureau.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1906.

GALON S. CLEVENGER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

HORATIO CARTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 849) granting an increase of pension to Horatio Carter, which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "thirty."

Mr. PATTERSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

CALL OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would suggest that there is not present a quorum of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. HEYBURN. Pending the call of the Senate, I am advised——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would state that there is no business in order pending the roll call.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not going to propose any business, but I think, if I may, by unanimous consent, make a suggestion——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There can be no unanimous consent given.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will object to that. No business can be transacted.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand, but I was going to suggest the reason of the absence of many Senators.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CULLOM] is absent on account of illness. I therefore ask that he may be excused.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the senior Senator from Illinois will be excused.

Mr. SCOTT. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. ELKINS], I will state that he is a pall bearer at the funeral of the late General Wheeler, and consequently is absent from the Senate at this time. I presume that is the case with many other Senators who are absent.

The roll call having been concluded, the following Senators were announced as having answered to their names:

Allee	Dillingham	Kittredge	Proctor
Allison	Dubois	La Follette	Rayner
Ankeny	Flint	Latimer	Scott
Bailey	Foster	Lodge	Simmons
Beveridge	Frazier	Long	Smoot
Brandegee	Fulton	Mallory	Spooner
Bulkeley	Gallinger	Newlands	Stone
Burkett	Gamble	Overman	Sutherland
Burnham	Gearin	Patterson	Teller
Burrows	Hansbrough	Penrose	Warner
Carmack	Heyburn	Perkins	Warren
Carter	Hopkins	Piles

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

FOREST-RESERVE LANDS.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the subject that I desire to discuss at this hour is one that concerns the Senators and the country more, perhaps, than would be indicated from a casual observance of the bill and its title. I ask that there be taken from the table Senate bill No. 1661, and that the bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks to have laid before the Senate a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1661) to reimburse the States and Territories for sections 16 and 36 when taken for forest or other Government reserves.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill introduced by Mr. HEYBURN, December 14, 1905, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any lands contained in sections 16 and 36 of the public lands of the United States, which have been granted to a State or Territory for educational purposes, shall be included in the withdrawal of public lands for the purpose of creating forest or other Government reserves, the said State or Territory shall be compensated by the payment out of the Treasury of the United States into the educational fund of the State or Territory in which said lands are situated, a sum of money not less than the minimum price at which said lands are authorized to be sold by the State or Territory, whenever it is made to appear that there are not sufficient surveyed public lands of the United States subject to selection by the said State or Territory in lieu of the lands so included within the reserve as aforesaid of the cash value of at least the minimum price at which said lands so taken by the Government may be sold under the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it will be seen that this bill is one that directly affects the public school funds of the country. The importance of this measure, or a like measure, has been growing upon us as the policy of the Administration in the execution of the forest-reserve laws has developed. We have now reached a point where we must, by legislation, take hold of the question of the creation of forest reserves and the management and control of them under the authority of the Constitution of the United States vested in us to control the public lands.

In 1891 Congress yielded up this constitutional power, or, rather, delegated it to the executive department of the Government. Our constitutional power over the public lands of the United States is expressed in section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution, and it reads:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

That last clause has been lost sight of both in the legislation and in the execution of the laws that have been enacted on this subject. I think the attention of the legislators was distracted before completing the reading of that provision of the Constitution, and that they lost sight of the fact that the rights of the States are to be protected as well as the rights of the Government. That provision was undoubtedly based upon the fact that the public lands lying within the States, so far as their usefulness was to be developed from settlement, could only be realized by those who made their homes within the States; that that property, in order to contribute its proportionate share to the maintenance of the State, to the expenses of the State government, must be developed and controlled by the individuals who should become attached to it and make it the basis of a home. That is the primary principle underlying the acquisition, the control, and the development of the public lands of the United States.

No subject that has ever been before Congress has attracted more attention from the very earliest days of the legislative history of this country than that pertaining to the public lands of the country. Congress primarily is vested not only with the power to deal with this question, but with the responsibility for the administration of this asset of the Government. In an hour of unwisdom in 1891, on the 3d of March, Congress provided what seemed at that time to be a very innocent measure, as follows:

SEC. 24. That the President of the United States may, from time to time, set apart and reserve, in any State or Territory having public land bearing forests, in any part of the public lands wholly or in part covered with timber or undergrowth, whether of commercial value or not, as public reservations, and the President shall, by public proclamation, declare the establishment of such reservations and the limits thereof.

There is no word of limitation or protection thrown around that absolute power vested in the executive department of the Government to withdraw public lands from the purposes for which they were acquired and the purposes for which they are held and place them in a forest reserve. The word "reserve" might mean anything, but it certainly does not mean that they are no longer available for the home-making purposes of the settler and the pioneer.

It was apparent after a few years that this authority should be surrounded by some safeguard; that some limitation should be placed upon it; so that subsequently it was provided that—

No public forest reservation shall be established, except to improve and protect the forest within the reservation, or for the purpose of securing favorable conditions of water flows, and to furnish a continuous supply of timber for the use and necessities of citizens of the United States; but it is not for the purpose or intent of these provisions, or of the act providing for such reservations, to authorize the inclusion therein of lands more valuable for the mineral therein, or for agricultural purposes, than for forest purposes.

That is the first limitation that was placed upon the power of the President to withdraw these lands. During Territorial days, in these geographic subdivisions of the country that are now States, Congress reserved public-land sections 16 and 36 for educational purposes. When Congress passed the enabling acts authorizing the people of the Territories to form State governments they said there should be granted to the States when formed the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections or denominated subdivisions. There is a line of decisions emanating from the judiciary of this country and from the judicial department of the executive department of the Interior, holding that those grants were not in præsenti, that they were inchoate grants, to be perfected upon the doing of something in the future.

That idea seems to have been adopted by the present executive department of the Government in dealing with this question. They have lost sight of the fact that when Idaho was admitted into the Union as a State the grant was in terms in præsenti; that Idaho did not come in in pursuance of an enabling act, but came in by a direct legislative provision of Congress, admitting it as of the status in which it presented itself to Congress. Notwithstanding this difference in the nature of the title or tenure of the State to these lands, the executive department has undertaken, in pursuance of the provision authorizing the withdrawal of land for forest-reserve purposes, to include the lands that passed to the State of Idaho by an absolute grant as of the date of the passage of the act, and has made no provision for the selection of other lands by the State even if it had the power to take the lands, which it has not.

I maintain, and I shall show upon authority, that there is no provision for the selection or exchange of lands to be taken from the State since the grant attached. The provision for the selection of lieu lands applies only to those lands the title of which had passed from the Government before the passage of the act admitting the State of Idaho into the Union; and the manner is indicated in the enacting provisions as to the place and manner of selection.

I maintain here and now that when Idaho was admitted as a State, the title to every sixteenth and thirty-sixth section of the public lands within the State passed to the State of Idaho, where the title rested at that time in the Government, and that they were not and have not been at any time since the admission of Idaho a part of the public lands of the United States.

But through a mistaken interpretation of the law the executive department has undertaken to treat those lands, those sections 16 and 36, in the State of Idaho, as of the status of lands which were reserved in the Territories to be applied to public school purposes. They have made a mistake. I desire it to be distinctly understood that I am not here for the purpose of making an attack upon the Administration or any individual connected with it, but I am here for the purpose of laying the foundation to right a wrong that has been perpetrated under a misinterpretation of the authority given by an act of Congress.

Here I pause long enough to call attention to a map of Idaho, which I have had placed upon the wall, and I desire to say that if any Senator wishes to see that map more closely, I have photographic copies of it here and will be pleased to have them sent to their desks.

The map, when inserted in the RECORD, will show the forest reserves already created in cross lines and the forest reserves selected to be created in straight lines. The colors upon this map will, of course, not appear in the RECORD, but sections will be easily distinguished by the difference of lines.

The area of forest reserves already created in Idaho is 9,488,324 acres, or 14,825 square miles. The area of forest reserves proposed to be created in Idaho in February is 5,855,556 acres, or 9,149 square miles, making a total area of 15,343,880 acres, or 23,974 square miles.

The total area of the State of Idaho, according to the last census, is 84,290 square miles. It thus appears that the lands withdrawn and to be withdrawn for forest reserves are equal to 28.4 per cent of the entire area of the State of Idaho.

The portion of that map in green represents the forest reserves that have been already created. The portion of the map in yellow represents, according to this letter of transmittal from the Chief Forester of the United States to myself upon my request, lands that are intended to be withdrawn or included as forest reserves on or after February 5, 1906.

I requested a statement as to the lands already included within the forest reserves as well as those contemplated to be included within forest reserves, and that map is the answer to my request. It is official and authentic, and these photographs of it, which I had made for convenience and colored appropriately, are, of course, an exact sunprint of that map and do not vary from it in any manner.

A statement has been made in the public press in regard to some remarks which I made before a committee of this House to the effect that the map which I used upon that occasion was not correct. That is the map and this is the letter transmitting it to me, saying in effect that the map correctly represents the facts. So there can be no question that these photographs speak as truly as sunlight can speak, because they have reproduced nothing except that which was upon that map.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask the Senator to state what is the actual character of these lands reserved for forest purposes?

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall have occasion to deal with that question in some detail.

Mr. DOLLIVER. And what proportion of the area of the State is included in the forest reserves?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state that now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr GALLINGER. If the Senator please, I should like him to give an approximate estimate of the value of these lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall be glad to deal with that.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me a moment further, we are trying to get a little forest reserve in the White Mountains. Objection is made that it is going to cost the Government something. I want to ascertain how much it costs the Government to withdraw lands and make forest reserves out in the Western States.

Mr. WARREN. While the Senator is pausing in his remarks I desire to ask him a question. I assume that the constitution of his State fixes a minimum price at which State lands can be sold, and I should be glad to have in the RECORD a statement of the minimum price for which the State of Idaho is allowed to sell its lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Are not the lands that are marked in yellow upon the map simply those that are determined by proclamation of the President for the purpose of examination, with a view to the possible creation of future forest reserves?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are not.

Mr. SMOOT. Part of that land may not be included in forest reserves at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I had the letter referring to that matter a moment ago. According to the letter, those are the lands that the forester, upon whose recommendation forest reserves are created by proclamation, will recommend to the President on the 5th of February, 1906, be created into a reserve.

Now, I have quite a comfortable supply of questions in my mind, and I shall endeavor to answer them all. First, as to relative areas. I have that data placed upon the bottom of each of these maps. I am using Idaho as a text. It may be that all I say in regard to Idaho will apply with equal force to a number of other public-land States; but I shall leave the question of those several States and their relation to the forest-reserve proposition to the representatives from those States upon this floor. However, I think I can illustrate and demonstrate the principle that I desire to discuss by taking Idaho as a text.

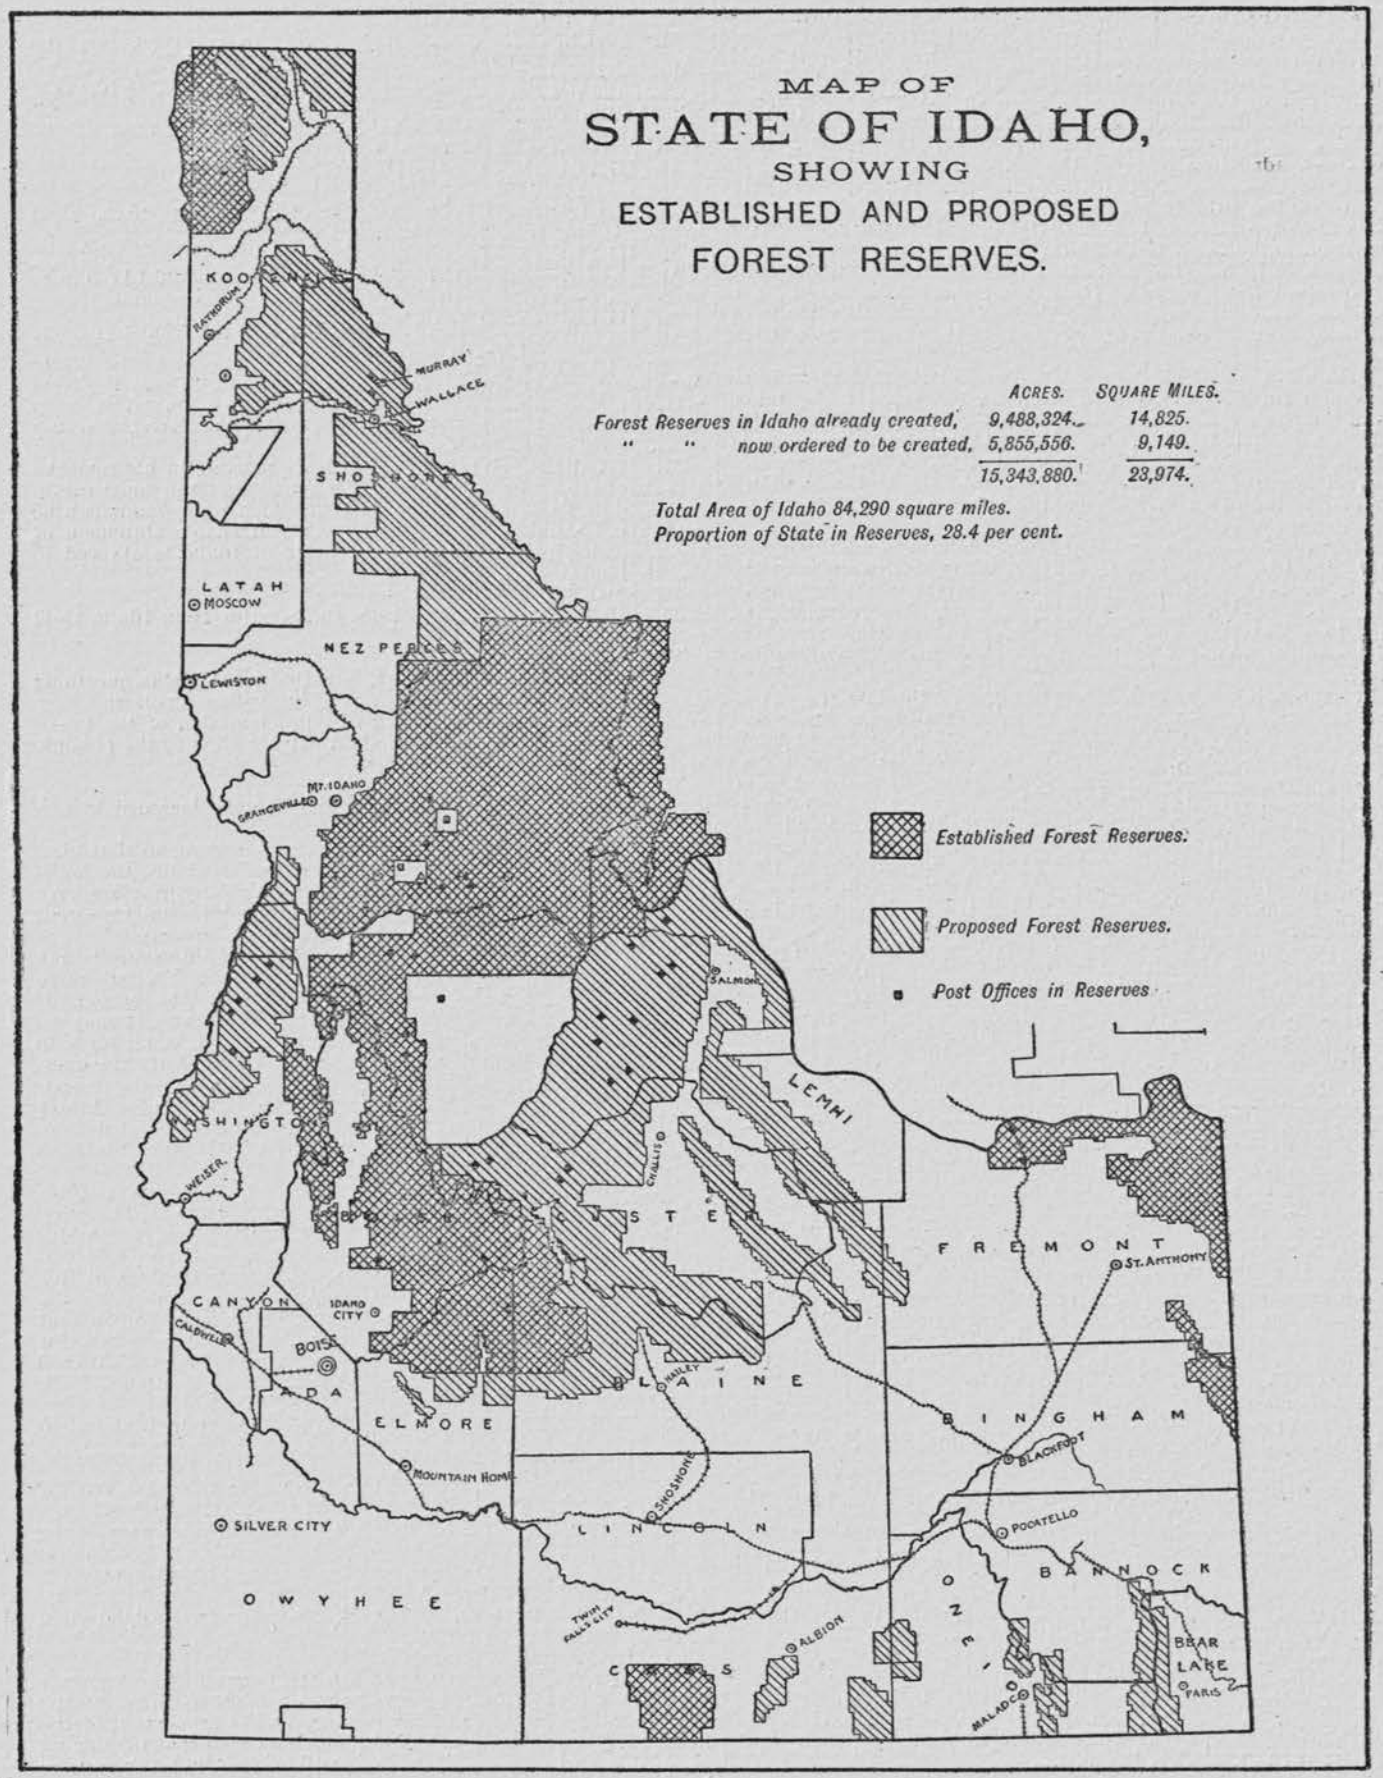
The forest reserves already created in Idaho by official proclamation include 9,488,324 acres, or 14,825 square miles. You can compare that area of square miles with some of the States represented upon this floor by two Senators, and you will find that it will take several of the States in certain sections of this country to make that area. The area to be included under the notice which I have received, and which is indicated upon that map, is 5,855,556 acres, or 9,149 square miles, making a total of forest reserves created and to be created in Idaho 15,343,880 acres, or 23,924 square miles, much larger than Scotland.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. What proportion is that of the total area of the State?



Mr. HEYBURN. That is 28.4 per cent of the total area of the State. Those figures are also upon the bottom of these maps. I have placed that data there for convenience of reference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows—I do not see it upon his map—how much of the area of the State is really in mountainous country—what proportion of the whole land of the State is mountainous land; so that in judging as to this matter we may know whether this 28.4 per cent is mostly mountain districts, or whether it takes in other classes of land.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will give the Senator information upon that question in the orderly presentation of what I have to say.

I have prepared and present here a map of Idaho showing only the forest reserves, so that nothing else may embarrass the eye. It is exactly the same thing as is shown upon that map [indicating]. There is the State of Idaho; there is the area included within forest reserves. It is a presentation that will appeal to the Senate upon the ground of fairness as to whether or not any State ought to be diminished to the extent of 28 per cent of its area by withdrawing land therein from settlement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. In just a moment. The right of settlement and the land upon which to make it constitute the basic element of prosperity and the chief asset of every new State, because it is men that make States, not trees. Now, I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho two questions. One is whether he thinks there ought to be any forest reserves in Idaho; and if so, what the extent of the area reserved should be? Also, in view of the fact that the present population of Idaho approximates 100,000——

Mr. HEYBURN. How many?

Mr. NEWLANDS. One hundred thousand, is it, or 150,000?

Mr. HEYBURN. Our school census indicates about 300,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. About 300,000. I was under a misapprehension. Then, I will ask the Senator, in view of the fact that her present population is 300,000 and that Idaho some day before very long will probably have a population of a million and a half, whether he regards the present reservation of one-fifth of the entire area for purposes of the future as unwise?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the questions submitted by the Senator from Nevada are exactly the questions to discuss while I am on my feet on this occasion, and I trust that before I take my seat I will have covered all of them.

It is not necessary that I should be required, because I object to the wholesale inclusion of the lands of the State in forest reserves, to lay out new forest reserves or to designate exactly the boundaries that I think should mark the forest reserves. I am not here to create forest reserves; I am here to control and limit them, and to undo the wrongs that have been done in this matter.

As to just what proportion of the State should be included in forest reserves, there is no set rule by which that may be governed. From the beginning of the world men have made their homes preferentially in the forests and in the mountains. The States of New England were settled in the forests in preference to the open plains. The States of the West were settled in the forest. Men need trees to make their homes, to build their fences, to construct their barns, and to lay the railroad iron upon. They need trees, and they go where they are to make their homes.

Idaho has, as I have said, about 300,000 population. Since its admission into the Union its population has grown more than three times larger than it was at that time, when its population was about 86,000. But it is territory and natural resources that make States primarily, or, as I should say, more correctly speaking, that are the foundation upon which a State can be made.

Idaho has the natural resources upon which a State of more than a million and a half of people can be speedily built. The question to-day is not whether the Government shall constitute itself our guardian and trustee and say how we shall administer the lands and the assets and the resources we have; that is not the Government's function. I have already shown that it does not possess the right to take from Idaho a single inch of ground that belongs to that State.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator has the figures, so that he can give them to the Senate, I should like to know the number of acres of arable land in the State of Idaho and the number of acres of arable land included in the proposed reservation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I could take some statistician's statement of it, Mr. President, and undertake to say to-day what was arable and what was not, and some pioneer would come along to-morrow and prove that I was in error by making a home upon the land which I had pronounced unfit for habitation. I might say what was mineral and what was not mineral, as the wiseacres have been doing for the last half a century in this country, and some prospector would come along to-morrow and prove that I was mistaken, as they have been doing for the last half century.

Mr. HOPKINS. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not asking for what some future party may say. I simply want the present information on the subject of the arable land in the State and the number of acres of arable land in the proposed reservation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not, nor has any person, ascertained the exact quantity of arable land in the State of Idaho, which covers more ground by 5,000 square miles than all of the States of New England, and the next generation will not have discovered and determined just how much arable land there is in that State. They will not have determined what land is mineral and what land is not mineral.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me? I simply ask for information. Is it not a fact that the main spur of the Rocky Mountains passes through the State of Idaho and that a large share of the lands which have been reserved and are proposed to be reserved is in the mountainous and rocky parts of the State, which are not really suitable for agricultural purposes, but whose chief value consists in the timber? Is it not a good plan to reserve this timber? While they are putting the lands within forest reserves are they not still open to mineral exploration and discovery under the forest-reserve law and practice?

Mr. HEYBURN. That inspires me to ask the Senator a question. For whom would you reserve this timber?

Mr. NELSON. For the American public, present and future.

Mr. HEYBURN. Living where—in Idaho or outside of it?

Mr. NELSON. The whole country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then this land that constitutes her geography is not an asset of Idaho, but an asset of the people of Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. It is an asset of the United States until the United States has parted with the title.

Mr. HEYBURN. The United States has parted with the title. The people of Minnesota—and the Senator will understand that I am making no invidious comparisons or attack—may have denuded their lands of timber; they may have been wasteful of the resources that nature gave them, and it might be convenient to-day for them to undertake to administer the assets of Idaho and to say, "You shall keep your settlers out of these mountains in order that we may come in there and find a supply of timber to continue our prosperity."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I had not finished answering the question. However, I will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wish to ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact that the governor of Idaho not long ago made a statement that he as governor of the State had made arrangements with the Department here that in lieu of sections 16 and 36 within forest reserves the State should receive other sections of land within the State?

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to answer that question before I take up another.

The governor of Idaho expressed himself in most hearty accord with the position I am taking here up to a certain time, when the chief forester went to Idaho and sat down cozily in the executive sanctum and induced the governor to believe that he had the power to exchange the lands of the Government within the State for these sections 16 and 36, belonging to the State school fund, and the governor at once, of course, was wreathed in smiles and said, "If you can do that, of course I will trade you these lands, the title of which resides in the State of Idaho, for other lands. You give me the right to select the other lands." And if I am not misinformed, acting upon that, he has actually gone ahead and selected 125,000 acres of grazing land in the State of Idaho, under the impression that he can yield up the title of the State to those lands, which passed by virtue of the admission act of Idaho State. And the forester, under the impression that he can give title to the public lands of the United States, has undertaken to give the governor of the State of Idaho the right to select public lands in lieu thereof. I should like to see the muniment of title that will pass between these gentlemen for those lands. I should like to know how the chief forester, the Secretary of the Interior, or the President of the United States is going to convey those lands to the State of Idaho, by what kind of instrument.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Having in mind our theory of government (whether it be stated expressly in the Constitution or not, it is certainly a part of our constitutional law), that the new States when admitted into the Union shall come in on an equal footing in all respects whatsoever with the original States, is not that theory violated when the Government withdraws permanently a large portion of the lands included within the boundary of a new State and holds it not for the benefit of the citizens of that State, but against their consent, for what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] suggests is for the benefit of the whole country?

Mr. HEYBURN. Probably one of the most interesting discussions that ever was had in the Senate of the United States was in regard to that question during the time when Mr. Clay and that school of statesmen were members of this body. A question arose as to who was the beneficiary of the trust in which these lands were held by the Government, whether it was the present and future inhabitants of a State or whether it was all the people of the United States regardless of where they reside; and that question divided this great body in that day.

I want to differentiate here as to the class or character of title that passed to the different States. They do not hold by the same tenure or measure of right. In the old days, when enabling acts were passed authorizing the formation of a State government, the words used were "there shall be" granted to the State. Under that language the courts, up to the Supreme Court of the United States, have held that that was not a grant in presenti; that it was an inchoate grant that could be perfected after the State was admitted, the lands surveyed, and the right attached to the definite sections and townships. The courts said in that case—the Nevada case—that until the land was surveyed the grant was necessarily a floating one, because it could not be known to what particular piece of land the 16 and 36 would attach. They held in that case that the title did not pass to the State until the land was selected and the selection ratified; that that was necessary.

In that case there was no State in existence when the enabling act of Congress was passed. The State was to come into existence or not, according to the conditions that should arise. If the people adopted a constitution, if they agreed upon a form of government, if they did certain things in the way of ratifying, then by proclamation of the President it became a State. That is true of most of our States.

In the reservation of land in the Territory for school purposes, sections 16 and 36, Congress used uniformly the expression "there shall be reserved." That was not a grant at all; it was a promise; and the Department has misconstrued and misapplied the law as applied to the States that were admitted under different conditions. They have applied the rule of law applicable to Territories in construing an entirely different law, and in one of the documents which I have before me they recite these decisions in justification of their act. They say the right of the State did not attach until the lands were surveyed and selected.

They disregarded the rule of the decisions in this respect, and they have gone ahead in Idaho and included within their reserve 4,400,000 acres of land that was surveyed and subdivided, which included 244,441 acres of public school lands. They have included mineral lands of vast extent, and they say that it is entirely at the discretion of the Department as to such inclusion; that their judgment controls as to whether or not land is more valuable for mineral or for agricultural or for forestry purposes. In the light of history, could anything be more absurd than that?

The mines of this country have been discovered by a class of men who know nothing of the science of geology, who know nothing of the rules by which these men attempt to measure and determine this question. Lands which have been pronounced worthless by scientific men—worthless according to all the rules and limitations of geological possibilities—are today the richest mining ground in the United States. I know men whom the community threatened to incarcerate because, forsooth, they were wasting their strength and their substance in digging in the earth in the hope of finding a mine who afterwards found the mine despite all of the adverse theories—mines which have produced millions and hundreds of millions of dollars.

To-day these parties are assuming to say that this is and that is not mineral. "This we may include and shut you out from, because it is a forest reserve, because it is not mineral land." They have included recently by this very order represented by this letter, represented by the yellow portion of that map, covering the Shoshone Reserve, about 340,000 acres of land that has just been adjudged by the Land Office to be mineral in character in a contest between the Northern Pacific Railway Company, which claimed that it was agricultural, and prospectors, who claimed that it was mineral in character. It has been decided, and that decision stands until reversed, to be mineral ground; and yet they say they have a right to include that class of land in a forest reserve, because they have the right to determine whether it is better adapted to "forestry purposes" than it is to mining or agriculture. Ah, but it is said, "The law allows a man to prospect and mine in a forest reserve, and we recognize his right to do it." They do not recognize his right. They will grant him a special privilege to do it, but he does not stand on a par with the American citizen who goes out into the public domain of the United States for the purpose of prospecting and finding mines. He does not go there of right under the law. He goes there by the grace of a bureau and its officers.

Here is a circular which they have issued, of date August 1, 1905.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it a ten-year right?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. He goes there and remains there just so long as the forester consents, and he can be put off at any time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Dispossessed?

Mr. HEYBURN. Dispossessed of his right. Then I have here a clipping from a local paper——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator mean to say that after the prospector goes on, under the permit of the forester, and locates his claim he can be dispossessed?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. After he has discovered his ore, established his mine, or taken such steps under the permit of the Department as he sees fit, that then he can be dispossessed?

Mr. HEYBURN. I can best answer that by reading the circular which I hold in my hand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is tremendously interesting to me, and I suppose to every Senator here. I ask for information.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to know whether that can be done.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the prospector can be dispossessed after he has located his claim under the permit of the Department?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer it in this way: In my judgment, this whole scheme will be overthrown by the courts when they come to deal with it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That may be.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I say until that day comes, as long as it is an executive function, they can put him out, and they will do it under their own rules.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Have they done so yet?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator anticipates a statement I intended to read from a paper which I have here on that very question, in which the Chief Forester made the statement that the miners had nothing to object to, had no ground for objections, because they were permitted to mine unmolested, and a local paper takes it up very promptly and calls his attention to something that was occurring right at that time, by his own chief forester in that division; and I will invade the order of presenting this matter in order that the Senator may have an answer at this time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the Senator proceed in his own way. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator's orderly procedure.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no more important feature of this under discussion than that of the miners and their rights to mine upon this land.

I will read the circular which I was proceeding to read. I also have a statement of a newspaper published right in the district, right in the place where these things occurred; and I thought I could put my hand on it immediately. I will answer the Senator. I will, however, proceed with the circular which I was reading and then I promise the Senator I will call the attention of the Senate to further facts. This circular is of date August 1, 1905:

AMENDED CIRCULAR—FINAL PROOF CLAIMS IN FOREST RESERVES.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1905.

Registers and receivers, United States land offices.

SIRS: Attention is called to the following reissue of the circular of April 8, 1905, with additions thereto suggested by the Forestry Bureau, Department of Agriculture. The original circular is in full force and effect, the reissue being deemed necessary to more fully emphasize the purpose of the original circular.

1. Hereafter you will, when issuing notice of intention to make final proof upon claims, either mineral or nonmineral, within an established forest reserve, furnish a copy thereof to the forest supervisor in charge of such reserve, in order that he may be enabled to be present at the taking of final proof to examine and cross-examine claimant and his witnesses, or may protest the passage of the mineral application to entry, as the case may be. In the former case, whenever the supervisor may deem it necessary, the examination may be reduced to writing at the cost of the claimant and made a part of the final proof in that case. You will request the forest supervisor to make proper return of the proof notice, to be made a part of the case, with such notations thereon as he may consider best.

2. You will carefully examine any proofs for claims within forest reserves, whether mineral or nonmineral, together with any evidence furnished by the forest supervisor or brought out by his examination, and either reject, suspend, or approve the same according to the following directions——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that an official circular?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is sent to me as an official circular.

Mr. SPOONER. To whom is it addressed?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is addressed to the "Registers and receivers, United States land offices."

Mr. SPOONER. By whom is it signed?

Mr. HEYBURN. By the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, J. H. Fimple, and approved by Thomas Ryan, Acting Secretary. I called for these circulars, and they were sent me.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me again?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I have forgotten the terms of the forest-reserve act. To what extent, if at all, does it interfere with the laws of the land on the subject of locating mines?

Mr. HEYBURN. The forest-reserve act in itself declares that mineral lands are not intended to be included within reserves, and later on Congress passed a law as an amendment, I think, to the sundry civil bill or some other bill, providing that prospecting might be done and locations might be made in forest reserves.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Under regulations?

Mr. HEYBURN. Under regulations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is that the regulation?

Mr. HEYBURN. This is the regulation made pursuant to it, I assume. There have been other regulations. I am going to call the attention of the Senate to the form required. Now, this is a limitation on the right of mining. These are the rules laid down by which to test the right of the man to make his final entry of a mining claim:

3. If sufficient facts appear upon the face of the record, you will reject the final proof, advising claimant of your reasons therefor, with the right of appeal. No further action thereon will be required from the forest supervisor.

Just think of that. Analyze that. That is a distinct rule.

3. If sufficient facts appear upon the face of the record, you will reject the final proof.

Not "if you can find that this man is entitled to enter his claim, you will allow him to have it," but the negative is stated. It carries with it the assumption that the officers are there to see that he does not get it unless he can run the gantlet. That is the spirit of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to read a little more of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is not that rather a criticism of the method of expression instead of the expression itself?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am here for the purpose of criticising the method of the execution of this law as well as the enactment of it, as well as the wisdom of the law itself. I am here to criticise the method of its execution for the purpose of emphasizing what I shall ask Congress to do at the right time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not criticising the Senator's criticism of either, but from his last remark I am asking him if his criticism is not directed rather to the form of expression than the substance?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the form, indicating the spirit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to finish reading this, and then I will not have it all broken up in the RECORD. I will yield to the Senator from Utah in a moment.

4. If you believe the proof to be fraudulent, or doubtful, but do not have sufficient reasons to justify its rejection, or if the forest supervisor has returned the notice with a definite protest against the claim, you will suspend the proof and submit a brief statement of the facts in the case to the special agent in charge of the district in which said proof is made, such statement to include the names and addresses of claimants and witnesses, and your reasons for the suspension of the proof. You will forward the proof to this office with a copy of your letter to the special agent. The special agent will then proceed to make such investigation as he may deem necessary, and to submit his report on the approved form. Upon receipt of his report, appropriate action will be taken upon the entire record as then made up.

5. If you believe the proof to have been made in good faith and that the law has been in all respects complied with, you will pass such proof to entry in the regular order, upon compliance by the claimant with all the requirements therein and on the payment of fees and commissions, but you will in no case issue final certificate or pass a mineral application to entry when any definite protest by a forest officer has been made against the claim.

6. You will promptly notify the forest supervisor of whatever action you take in every case.

The names and addresses of forest supervisors will be furnished you by this office. Notices of claims in forest reserves in which there is no forest officer in charge should be forwarded to the Forester, Agricultural Department, Washington D. C.

Very respectfully,

J. H. FIMPLE,
Acting Commissioner.

Approved August 1, 1905.

THOS. RYAN, Acting Secretary.

There is a document that places the miners of Idaho at a disadvantage as compared with the miners in other parts of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator a question. In his experience in Idaho in relation to forest reserves and the location of mineral claims upon a forest reserve, has not the Senator found that this very instruction which is coming from the Department at this time has been given for the very purpose of avoiding fraud? And is it not true that many times miners, or alleged miners, have gone upon forest reserves in Idaho and other States and simply located upon a piece of land, calling it a mineral claim, when there was no other object on earth than to get the timber within the claim and when there was no mineral whatever there? Is not this instruction given to obviate that very difficulty rather than to have a miner expelled from the reserve for seeking mines?

Mr. HEYBURN. Such is not the case. There is so small a percentage of fact upon which to base a question of that kind that it is not worthy of being taken into consideration. Men do not subject themselves to the hardships of prospecting except for an earnest purpose. They do not go out into the woods to hunt worthless lands. They do not go to the trouble to stake worthless ground. They are there for the earnest purpose of finding valuable mines, in the hope that they may inure to their permanent benefit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator contend that the regulation which he has just read is not legally issued by the Department under the authority given the Department by the law to make the necessary regulations?

Mr. HEYBURN. Possibly——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So far as legality is concerned, it is legal.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am trying to get the ground of the Senator's objection. The Senator, I understand, is now attacking the wisdom of the regulation, the wise policy of the regulation, and not the legality of the regulation under the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am rather illustrating the unwisdom of this law by pointing out the manner of its execution, which is often the surest test, because the executive officer primarily interprets the law in the process of its execution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand; and not the illegality of the regulation itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. The illegality goes back to the act of Congress authorizing the Department to make the regulation. It places the miner or the prospector in one part of the country, upon the public domain of the United States, at a disadvantage or upon a different level or measure of right than another prospector in another part of the country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That would go to the wisdom of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let us consider it as a whole—wisdom, policy, and all together.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That being true, I will ask the Senator one more question, and I think I shall have no more questions to ask him. That is this: Would he, as a matter of policy, throw open the forest reserves of the country to the unlimited exploration of miners and prospectors precisely the same as the rest of the public domain?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Making no distinction——

Mr. HEYBURN. Not a particle of distinction.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Between what was done in a forest reserve and what was done outside of one?

Mr. FULTON. I will ask the Senator from Indiana why not?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am myself asking for information. The Senator from Idaho is speaking most interestingly on a very important subject, where he claims a discrimination is made against a certain class of our citizens, and I am asking him, or the Senator from Oregon, or the Senator from Colorado a question. I am asking whether or not they would throw open the forest reserves to unlimited prospecting of miners substantially the same as any other public land?

Now, when that question is answered we will get to the heart of the matter.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me to answer the question I will answer it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Soon after the passage of this law, which was passed about 1887, or somewhere along there, a law was enacted that all forest reserves should be open to prospecting by miners; and the prospector takes his claim in a forest reserve exactly as he takes it anywhere else; and until these recent circulars we never have had any trouble. He has gone to the Land Office and shown that he was on a forest reserve. He has proved it up according to the law and the practice, and he has taken his title.

Recently these new circulars have come in, and a new law. While under the law creating these reserves there is provision for the preservation of the timber on the land, there is no provision of the law that will justify any man in saying that they could change the law with reference to prospecting on the public lands.

If I may say a word, although I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Idaho, I will say that these laws of location have been in force for more than fifty years. They came in force by the consent of the people and had no other authority than that until 1866, when Congress enacted a general law for the securing of title to a claim by patent. These principles are just as well established as to the taking of claims in the Land Office for mining purposes as to the taking of claims under the homestead or any other act.

Now, I want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Utah. I have lived for forty-five years in a mining region, practically in a mining camp, and I say now that I never heard the complaint made at any time that any man ever filed on a piece of land and fraudulently secured title to a mine. He could only take a tract of land in some of the States 600 feet wide and 1,500 feet long; in some of the States he could only take 160 feet wide and 1,500 feet long, because the width of the claim is left to the State to determine under the act of 1866. No man would go into the forest and attempt to take timber with that kind of a claim.

Further, Mr. President, it has never been a practice in the Land Office to do this. I have procured claims for myself and other people. I hold now a large amount of property that I have acquired as the law provided I should, and if it did not have a mine on it it would not be worth 10 cents. It must have a claim on it that will produce gold or silver or else it is good for nothing.

There are a good many other things I should like to say when the time comes, but I will not interfere with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will supplement what the Senator from Colorado has said. I would not charge the Senator from Indiana with minimizing the mining interests or industries at all, but when he compares it with forestry or the benefit to be derived from the creation of forest reserves, it seems to me that a word of emphasis and explanation is due.

The forest reserves in Idaho this last year produced, as I am informed, less than $8,000, if I have the correct figures of the income to the Government from that source. The mining interests of Idaho this last year produced more than $23,000,000 into the treasure and wealth of the country from the various channels into which it flows. There is no comparison as to the relative importance of the two. Forests are not a thing that grew up yesterday, are here to-day, and if destroyed are gone forever. Those forests were in Idaho when the stars sang together in the morning. They have lived through the centuries, renewing themselves by the processes of nature, and they will continue to live.

In north Idaho our forests, according to the careful estimate of those capable of estimating it, increase about 8 per cent a year. It must depend of course upon the rainfall, and the character of the soil, and the character of timber. That is not uniform, but it is applicable to north Idaho. That increase is quite sufficient to meet any waste that has ever been committed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a word, before I am interrupted, about the question of waste. Every circular from the Department, every utterance of the Department, dwells upon the waste of the public timber. There never was a log of it wasted. No man ever cut a tree without a purpose. It was either to warm him by his fireside, to provide the lumber to make his home, to sell in the market, or to build residences for other people. But there is no such thing as wasted timber. The forests of Wisconsin and Minnesota have not been wasted. They are to be found to-day in the beautiful cities of those States. They are to be found in the beds of their railways. They are to be found in the homes and barns and fences of the farmers. That is the transfer of the forest to the useful purposes for which a beneficent Providence designed it.

So we misuse the term "waste;" and all of the lectures that are delivered on the question of forestry throughout the country are predicated upon the proposition that the timber in the West is being wasted. I know of no man in Idaho who wants to waste a foot of its timber. I do not know of any citizens who ruthlessly and uselessly cut down its trees. They have converted them into homes, into cities, into useful purposes. They have been doing it since the beginning of the world. There is more timber to-day in States like Iowa than there was when I was a boy. There is more timber to-day in the State of Indiana than there was when the Senator from Indiana was a boy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. In parts of it. I speak of useful timber, appropriately distributed. Of course, there is a portion of Indiana that was heavily timbered with walnut. The settlers went in there, and I remember very well when they were slaying it, burning it up, in order to make room for their homes, because they had no homes elsewhere; and they have regretted it ever since and have wished that they had that walnut timber back. But if they will think twice they have something better than the walnut timber. They have those beautiful farms and homes and cities into which it went. It is true that some of it was piled and burned in order to get it away, because there was no market for it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator discovers an attack where none had thus far been advanced or perhaps contemplated. I merely asked the Senator, and that for information, whether his purpose would be to throw open the forest reserve to the same exploitation by prospectors that lands not on forest reserves were thrown open to? That was the question, and in that there was no comparison intended or actually made between the relative importance of the mining industry or the mining resources of the great State of Idaho and the timber resources of that or any other State. I trust, Mr. President, that I have a just appreciation of both.

Since, however, the Senator said something about the relative returns of the forests and the mines, and in language as truthful as it was poetic, said the forests were standing there when the morning stars sang together and would continue to stand there while that song was continued, I may say that the same can not be said of mines, which are closed when the ore is taken from the earth. The forests, if properly maintained and not permitted to be ruthlessly destroyed, as in many sections of this country they have been ruthlessly and sometimes ignorantly destroyed, preserve and conserve the waterfall, letting it go into the streams gradually, that it may laugh down through channels to the enrichment of the fertile valleys below in which after all is found the wealth—the true resources of any country.

Mining is a great industry. I appreciate it. I appreciate it quite as much as the Senator. But after all the elemental industry upon which all other industries depend and about which all other industries cluster is the agriculture that we find in our valleys and upon our plains; and it is not to preserve a tree in its pristine beauty, but it is that the waterfall may be equally distributed in order that these otherwise fertile valleys shall not become barren deserts that forest reserves are established.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to say before the Senator interrupts me, inasmuch as it belongs here—of course I did not misunderstand the Senator, and, while I may have spoken earnestly, it was not intended as resentment—I should like to make the suggestion that there never was a mountain where there was not a valley, for one exists only because of the other.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the mountains are usually covered with timber.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that some of the reservations to which I could take him are located in places where the annual rainfall is from 60 to 70 inches, and it would not seem that there is a very great deal of importance to be attached to the work of conserving the waterfall in streams that run down the mountains in that part of the country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will be generous enough to permit me, speaking out of an abundance of lack of information compared with the vast information the Senator possesses——

Mr. FULTON. Only as to that one locality.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I say it is a matter of common knowledge that regardless of the extent of the rainfall, if the forests and the vegetation are not there to hold it from rushing suddenly into the channels of the streams, the result is that when there is a great rainfall there is a torrential flood, and that when there is not the rainfall the waters have all run off and we have a drought. Even in the Mississippi Valley, where the forests have well-nigh been cut off and they are now raising trees by planting them, we find that when the forests were there the rivers were steadily bank full, as they are in England. Now they will have a vast flood, as there is almost yearly on the Ohio, and then the waters will subside so that streams otherwise swollen become mere brooklets, in which one can wade.

That is the point. The forests do not increase or diminish the rainfall. The forests permit the rain, after it has fallen, to go gradually into the channels of the streams and thus continuously fertilize the valleys. The Senator does not deny that?

Mr. FULTON. I only say, Mr. President, the Senator is making an excellent speech. The trouble is it does not apply to the situation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, the Senator's forest reserve in Washington does not apply to the forest reserve in Idaho, and therefore I had to direct my remarks to the question put to me by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. I only wanted to say a few words in reply to the question of the Senator from Indiana as to whether or not Senators would want the portions of the public domain within forest reserves opened to the prospector without limitation or regulation or special permission. To any Senator acquainted with the industry of mining it will suggest itself at once that there is no necessity for regulations surrounding the prospector. When the prospector enters a mountain, with timber or not, he goes there either with his pick and his shovel upon his shoulder or with his pack mule bearing for him his tools and his food, looking for the evidences of minerals, either upon the surface or very close to the surface, and until he discovers minerals it is impossible for him, under the law, to interfere with the timber in any way, except it may be to build a fire with which to cook his food or to cut a few branches to secure for himself a shelter. He has no title of any kind or character to the public domain until he discovers ore, except just so much of it as he may at the time be occupying with his feet.

Therefore, so far as the prospector and the forest reserves are concerned, the prospector can not injure them while he observes the law, and there is no necessity for regulations or permissions in order that he may enter them. Any regulation that is put around a prospector under those circumstances simply thwarts and impedes the discovery of mines of the precious metals, which, in the matter of trade and commerce and the industries of this great world, are almost as important as the crops themselves that are raised in the fields.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that, so far as I am concerned, I regard every regulation which is connected with the advent of the prospector into the forest reserves as being an unnecessary impediment to the development of the mining resources of the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, the circular which I had and which I read provides that the prospector must satisfy a forester of the validity and legitimacy of his claim before he may be permitted to enter at the land office. A man having a mining claim off the reservation goes to the land office and shows a valid location, which is prescribed by the statute, showing a compliance with the provisions of the statute with reference to the discovery, marking of his claim, the performance of the necessary $500 worth of labor, he is entitled to a patent, because the Government says that whenever a man has proven his faith in his discovery to the extent that he has expended in labor and improvements thereon $500, the Government will take him at his word and grant him a patent for it and convey him the fee simple. Prior to that time he holds his title simply by virtue of expending a hundred dollars in labor and improvements each year.

Now, along comes a regulation of the Department—not a law—and takes away from that miner the right which the law gave him to patent his claim, and says: "No; your neighbor, who is 100 feet away from you outside the reservation line, may have the benefit of the statute regulating the patenting of mines, but you can not, because we have included you by an Executive order within a forest reserve." You have got to not only satisfy the requirements of law, but you have got to convince this forester that you have a valid claim, or you have got to convince the tribunal to which an appeal from his decision may be taken, who perhaps never saw a mine and does not know anything about it, that this is a valid claim. It may be that that prospector has gone upon the public domain and found that which, in his judgment, is the infallible evidence of an ultimate mine, something to which the language of the United States Supreme Court in Harrington v. Chambers applies, where the court said that whenever the miner is willing to expend his money and devote his time to the development of a mining claim the Government will inquire no further, because it assumes that men are not going to expend their time and money except for the reason that they believe they have found a mine.

So I say, to resume, that, under the law, when a man has found that which he believes will result in a profitable mine he may patent it, in the absence of this restrictive legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Only a moment. I am not controverting anything the Senator from Idaho says. I recognize the importance of the subject and the Senator's fullness of information in regard to it. I want to ask him if he knows any reason why the provision of the law to which I call his attention is not now in force? If it be in force, it would seem to be a very plain proposition that the Senator is correct in his contention that this circular is without the authority of law.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He does not contend that, I understand.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I say it is absolutely in derogation of the law.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that I directed that particular inquiry to the Senator from Idaho, as to whether his contention was that the circular was without authority of law, and the Senator said no; that he did not——

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I said when it got into court, where it ought to be taken, it would be inevitably declared to be absolutely void.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am mistaken. I understood the Senator to say he did not question the legality of the regulation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, well; that is another proposition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; authority of law and legality of regulation are the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin, and he has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not claim to be very familiar with the laws as they now stand in relation to this subject, but I find here in the act of 1897 a general provision for forest reservations, those heretofore created and those hereafter to be created. I find the provision also that—

It is not the purpose or intent of these provisions, or of the act providing for such reservations, to authorize the inclusion therein of lands more valuable for the mineral therein or for agricultural purposes than for forest purposes.

Then comes this provision, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Idaho, that—

And any mineral lands in any forest reservation—

You see the act has provided for forest reservations existing and forest reservations to be hereafter created—and any mineral lands in any forest reservation which have been or which may be shown to be such, and subject to entry under the existing mining laws of the United States and the rules and regulations applying thereto, shall continue to be subject to such location and entry, notwithstanding any provisions herein contained.

That is the general statute, the statute referred to by the Senator from Colorado, and it seemed very clearly to establish the proposition, first, that these reservations were to be opened to the location of mines, which involves of necessity that they shall be open to exploration to determine whether there are or are not in probability mines, and that being mines in prospect, having been discovered, they may be located under the existing mining laws of the United States, and the rules and regulations applying thereto, without any obstruction whatever from this forest-reserve act. If that is true, then it must be true that a regulation which subjects a mining claim or location to the test of the judgment of a forester instead of the judgment of the land officers of the United States is not in harmony with the law and is not applied throughout the country to mining claims generally.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am very glad to have the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin as to the potency of the statute and the absolute invalidity of any order of regulation that seeks to limit it. Let me now, in connection with that, call the attention of the Senate further to a regulation which I find in the Forest Reserve Manual. I may be met with the statement that this manual is now obsolete. It was issued by the Department and was in force during the time I had this question under consideration, because I want to say here when the first forest reserve was created in Idaho, after the passage of the act, I came to Washington, went before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and protested against it; and from that day to this I have been endeavoring to undo the effects of that legislation wherever, as in the State of Idaho, it has been so executed as to absorb the public domain and exclude the people from it. So the question is not a new one at all. Here is a rule that was in force, and I have had occasion frequently to protest against it. It is the report to be made on a mining claim by the forester. It is a blank in this manual. It is the form that the forester is required to follow or to be guided by:

REPORT ON MINING CLAIM.

——— ——— Reserve.

Date: —— day of ———, 190—.

1. Name and address of claimant ——— ———.
2. Location of claim (by legal subdivisions or natural landmarks; preferably use description given in register of mining claims as filed in district recorder's office) ——— ———.
3. Has it been recorded? (If so, state where, by whom, and under what designation) ——— ———.
4. Topography of land or claim (state whether level, steep slope, rough, broken ground; whether in valley, on hillsides, or on top of ridge or butte) ——— ———.
5. Surface (state whether even or rough and broken, smooth or strewn with rocks) ——— ———.
6. Soil (state whether coarse sand, clay, or loam; whether stony, gravelly, fertile, or useless for agricultural purposes) ——— ———.
7. Is there water on or near the claim which may be used in working this claim? ——— ———.
8. Is there now a ditch or other means of bringing water on this claim for prospecting or mining purposes? ——— ———.
9. If not, what has claimant done in the past to supply water for this work? ——— ———.
10. Is the claim clearly staked by posts or marks? ——— ———.
11. Kind of claim (placer, etc.) ——— ———.
12. Kinds of mineral alleged to exist on claims (gold, silver, lead, etc.) ——— ———.
13. When located ——— ———.
14. Has assessment work been performed every year requiring an expenditure of not less than $100, and what evidence is there to substantiate this? ——— ———.
15. What improvements are there on the claim?
    (b) Excavations (extent and depth, length of shaft, etc.) ——— ———.
16. Is there timber on the plain? If so, what kinds and how much? ——— ———.
17. What evidence is there to show that there is mineral enough to make the claim a valid mining claim? ——— ———.

It is the forester who is going to report on this. There is not anybody on earth entitled to pass on that, under the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Chambers v. Harrington, except the man who locates and expends his time and money on the claim. His faith is the test. He may work there for years and years, as those of us who have spent a lifetime in the mines know men do, and then, after everybody but himself has given up hope, realize his fondest dreams.

18. Has the claim been thoroughly examined by an expert prospector—

By an expert prospector! That, I suppose, would mean a man with bifurcated hair. That is the usual "expert prospector," as we understand—or miner employed to ascertain the character of the claim?

Who is to employ him to go there and nose around this prospector's claim to see whether or not, in the judgment of this "expert prospector," the miner is justified in spending his time and wearing away his life to ascertain the character of the claim and develop it.

If so, what is his name and finding? (Use extra sheet if much information is added.)

19. When and by what forest officer was claim inspected?

He does not have to be a miner, but a "forest officer." Then take that in connection with the circular, which says in case of an adverse report by him this poor fellow is tied up indefinitely, probably not able to stand the expense and strain of a contest to show that that forester did not know a mine from a tree.

20. Opinion of forest officer, and reasons for such opinion: Do you think claim a valid one?

He is given judicial authority to determine whether or not this claim is marked upon the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced; whether or not the ledge is one of rock in place or mineral-bearing rock in place; and whether or not it is a legal claim. This man has to express an opinion on these matters.

Experience has taught us that the opinions which come down from these field rangers, who are sent out by the Department, are harder to overthrow than are the decisions of any court below that of a court of last resort, because there is a certain dogmatic manner of stating these things which this class of men allege to be facts which is accepted by the Department. They say, "We know this man whom we have appointed to make investigation; we have confidence in him; we sent him out there; he has no interest in finding anything except the real facts, and we will not reverse his decision." The poor prospector becomes a trespasser from that moment; he has no right to the forest reserve except to move on.

I am speaking for the mining interests of the United States, because all the mining land that there is of future consequence in Idaho is either under a forest reserve or under the threat of a forest reserve—most of it under a forest reserve. The widening fields of the prospector, the widening fields of production, upon which the future of the State depends, are all under the ban of the forest reserve. Men may go there, not by right, but by grace. They go there not as other men have gone upon the lands where they have made free homes in this country, because the law gave them the right to do it. They not only go there by grace, but they stay there at the sufferance of the forester, who is delegated to exercise judicial functions in determining whether or not this man shall hold his claim. I reread rule No. 20:

20. Opinion of forest officer and reasons for such opinion. (Do you think claim a valid one, or one merely located to hold the land for business location, town-site uses, or to obtain timber, or for other purposes?)

There is a spirit of suspicion directed against the honesty of men in every section of those regulations. The presumption suggested in them is that no man is honest; that American citizens can not be trusted to go out and take that which they are entitled to under the law. The presumption is that they will take that to which they are not entitled. We in Idaho are more interested, and the country is more interested in the settlement of vacant lands than in the manner of the settlement. We are more interested in the development of the mineral resources of the country than in the technical distinction as to whether or not the rule of the Department has been infracted or not. The ultimate purpose of the law is that the waste places shall be developed; that they shall add to the wealth of the country; that new fields shall be opened up; that civilization shall be widened and continuously spread.

Now, I will leave the mining feature of the subject for a moment, and I want seriously to call your attention to another phase of it. Our State will be great, populous, and prosperous according or not as this territory, which is the natural asset of the State, is left open to settlement. It is not enough to say that it is mountainous. Men live in mountains. No mountain exists without the valleys that make it the distinguishing feature above the level surface. Half the country that you traverse along the Atlantic coast is mountainous. The homes commence in the valleys and climb up until I have seen them at night like an eye in the mountain, where the miner's cabin or the settler's home was looking out like a sentinel over the valleys below. Most of the men from mountainous countries go to mountainous countries. The population that has come to us from Switzerland and such countries seeks the mountains rather than the open plains; they prefer the mountains; they are accustomed to the conditions that surround them; and, as I stated earlier in my remarks, the New World has always been settled in the timber. The pioneer goes where he can strip the bark from the tree to cover him from the storms until he can cut the tree and carve and lay it into the shape of a home.

I have seen, as many Senators have seen, cities and States grow. I once camped in a tent on the banks of the river where the beautiful city in which I now live stands when there were not two sticks crossed to mark the future city. I have seen that country grow from a forest, in which there was little or no evidence of promise to those unacquainted with the conditions, out of which cities, Territories, and States have grown. I have seen a community grow up since I first went there that has contributed to the treasure of this country more than $200,000,000 in substantial wealth. I have seen a country that has to-day from ten to fifteen thousand people in it grow up almost in a season. If these forestry people had been in the Coeur d'Alenes twenty years ago, none of the present conditions would have existed had they been free to do what they are now doing, and that country would to-day be an unexplored, undeveloped wilderness.

I can almost throw a stone from my back door onto a forest reserve. I made the statement to the Department that those lands in the proposed Shoshone Reserve were claimed as future homes by more than 100 people. They sent an inspector there by the name of Schwartz to criticise my statement. He has reported, and his report is printed in a document at Government expense, that he found they were nonresidents; that he found about 180 cabins, worth from $10 to $15 apiece. He criticised these embryo homes and the men who had selected this part of the earth as their place of abode or selection under the law. Had that same intelligent inspector been sent into the woods of Kentucky, Indiana, or Illinois in the early days he would have condemned the homes in which Lincoln, Grant, and Douglas were born as a violation of the law and unfit for human habitation—some of those cabins were without windows—and he would have condemned them as being evidence of bad faith on the part of the home maker. Lowell says "the woodman's ax and the settler's trowel are seldom wielded by the selfsame hand." The pioneer is sui generis. He does not build the beautiful homes that mark a country in its period of prosperity.

I have seen men stop along the banks of a river, strip the bark from the white cedar to make themselves a shelter over night, and in the morning, upon looking around the country, select that spot as their home; and I have seen beautiful homes grow on the ground where that bark shack was first constructed.

That is the reason I object to the class of inspection that is provided for in the regulations which I have read in the circular issued only in August of this last year, where a forester, a man who is sent out as an inspector for the Department, is to pass upon the good faith and the intention and the justification of the pioneer in selecting his share of the earth and determining where he will live.

There is now under proclamation and under promise of proclamation 111,000,000 acres of forest reserves in the United States that have grown out of that little seven and a half lines of amendment to the act of March 3, 1891, and it has expanded and has expanded until to-day it is larger than all of the Middle and New England States combined—11,000,000 acres, the Forester says, created and contemplated—and "contemplation" means created, because the lands are withdrawn even for the purpose of inspection, preliminary to the proclamation, which excludes the citizen just as effectually as does the creation of the reserve. Why, can it be possible—and I know I speak to some Senators who were here at the time and participated in this legislation—can it be possible that the Congress of the United States contemplated, when they gave that brief authority to the President to withdraw land in his discretion suitable for forest reserves, that one twenty-seventh of the United States would be within forest reserves within fifteen years? Can it be possible that Congress contemplated that that law was to be executed so that the forest reserves—which are no man's land, which have no element of self-government in them or about them, for they are governed by edict, by regulations, by rules, and by nonresidents—should be created to the present extent? Can it be possible that Congress intended that their areas should be greater than all the New England and Middle States combined, half the original thirteen States in area, with the promise of enlargement during the coming year in indefinite and glowing terms?

We want the States settled by real men who make homes and raise families, who till the soil, who grow the fruit, or engage in the industry best adapted to them.

I know, I was going to say, nearly every foot of the forest reserves of Idaho. I come as near knowing them as any man can know that area of country. I have traversed it north and south and east and west; I have camped on it; I have lived on it and alongside of it for nearly a quarter of a century. When you tell me that because that part of that country is covered with forests, because some of it is at an elevation of from four to six thousand feet above sea level that it is not adapted to making homes, I say the man who makes that statement does not know the country or he never saw a new country grow; that he is not capable of judging as to the conditions out of which men will make homes.

The most fertile fields of Colorado are at a greater elevation than those they have condemned because of their elevation in Idaho. I have seen exhibits of fruit at our fairs raised on these reserves the equal of which you can not produce on this coast. I have seen small fruits and berries cultivated, grown, and sent to market from within these reserves on land that they say is not susceptible of cultivation and that is fit only for a forest reserve that would do credit to any country.

I made these statements on one occasion and they sent a special agent out there to see whether or not they were true. He said he did not find these people living on the land. Why? The land was not open to settlement. He complained of the slight expense that they had incurred in making their homes. Under the law they were not justified in going to any expense. They went there merely for the purpose of indicating that as soon as the bounty of the Government was free to them and those lands were open to settlement they intended to make their homes or claim their rights under the law there. They marked that intention by the little cabin. Habitable? I do not care whether it is habitable or not. What is habitable for one man is not always habitable for another. It was the indication of their lawful selection.

He says they were engaged in various vocations in neighboring cities and towns and other parts of the country. Of course they were. They were industrious, occupied citizens of the United States, who, having been given by law the right to select a limited portion of the public domain and to make only one selection during their lifetime, had gone into these promising fields and forests and had, by building this rude log structure indicated their purpose of making this their home or their selection under existing law. They had then gone back to their usual vocations, to remain there industrious, law-abiding citizens until such time as the Government says, "Now the land is ready; go and make good your promise and your selection."

I have been criticised in some of the articles that have been inspired in this case. They have talked about sheaves of photographs being shaken in my face as a reproach against my statement that these people were settlers and intended settlers. Of course, there was no foundation for such statements; it was only part of a plan to attack the opposition to their plans by degrading it, by discrediting it, and bringing it into contempt. Throughout the country the press was fed with such statements, and I have one here, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate: "The President's rebuke."

This comes from the Pittsburg Dispatch of September 28, 1905, and it is a sample of the work of the press bureau that has undertaken to break down an honest and fair criticism of the manner of the execution of this law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator used the word "press bureau" rather emphatically. Do I understand him to say that there is any evidence that the Bureau of Forestry has a press agent or something in the line of Mr. Bishop?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read the answer to that from a document, and then I will leave it to the Senator's own judgment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I shall have no difficulty in doing it. I am not here to try to convict any Department of this Government. I am here, though, to defend an honest opposition to the maladministration of a bad law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Badly conceived and badly executed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The law might be defeated in the courts, but a question that involves all the people, where there is error, ought to be settled and rectified here.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is right, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN (reading):

Senator HEYBURN of Idaho, is the latest individual to discover that President Roosevelt has a policy in relation to the rights of the people which will admit of no interference on the part of anyone, not even a Senator.

"I will not for one moment—

This is quoted—

"consent to sacrifice the interests of the people as a whole to the real or fancied interests of any individual or of any political faction," wrote the President in response to a letter from the Senator, dealing with certain desired changes in forestry reserve."

Here is the next one: "HEYBURN in black book."

This is from the Spokesman-Review; but it was published in a lot of other newspapers. It went out from a syndicate here in Washington that was engaged in trying to prevent a candid opposition of this plan.

ROOSEVELT NO LONGER GIVES CONSIDERATION TO STATEMENTS OF IDAHO SENATOR, SAYS OREGONIAN WRITER—FACTS ABOUT AGRICULTURAL LAND IN SHOSHONE FOREST RESERVE AT VARIANCE WITH HEYBURN'S CLAIMS—MANY LOCATIONS BY HIS FRIENDS.

"When a United States Senator or any other man deliberately misrepresents facts to President Roosevelt, and the President finds it out, that man need never expect President Roosevelt again to place reliance in what he may say," says the Washington correspondent of the Portland Oregonian. "This statement has direct bearing on the case to be cited.

"On the night of March 30 a conference was held at the White House, attended by President Roosevelt, Senator HEYBURN of Idaho, Assistant Forester O. W. Price, of the Forest Service, and Assistant Land Commissioner J. H. Fimple. The conference was called to talk over forest-reserve conditions in Idaho, Mr. HEYBURN having repeatedly taken issue with the steps made by the Administration.

"On this particular night Mr. HEYBURN directed his attention to the proposed Shoshone Reserve"—

That is the one that lies right back of my house, right alongside of the town of Wallace, which land has been declared and adjudicated within the last few days to be mineral land. There are about thirty-nine townships of it.

"On this particular night Mr. HEYBURN directed his attention to the proposed Shoshone Reserve, which is to be created to embrace about one-half the area of Shoshone County, Idaho."

That is the county in which I live.

"The Senator was the first man called. 'Senator HEYBURN,' said the President, 'let us hear what you have to say.'

HEYBURN'S PLEA.

"The Senator said it was unnecessary; that the people of Shoshone County did not want it; that it would retard development, and added that much of its land had already been settled upon by industrious settlers who had gone into that country to make homes."

That is, the 180 people referred to in Shultz's report who went there and established the evidence of their intention on the ground by building the log houses referred to in the Shultz report.

"He made an earnest plea on behalf of these settlers, saying they would be hardshipped if their lands should be embodied in a forest reserve, and would be obliged in the end to relinquish the lands upon which they were struggling to build homes."

Of course, I did not say anything of the kind; but I am going to take this paper as we find it for present consideration.

"'Why, Mr. President,' exclaimed the Senator in conclusion, after he had asserted that there was a vast amount of purely agricultural land in the Shoshone withdrawal, "Mr. President, we have in that region an Adirondacks, where some of our wealthy men have built themselves summer homes.'"

I pause long enough to say that no such thing occurred, nor anything upon which to base such a statement.

"'If that country is not reserved, it will in time become a famous summer resort.'

"When Mr. HEYBURN concluded, Mr. Price"—

Mr. Price is the gentleman who was there to represent Mr. Pinchot, the chief forester of the United States—

"When Mr. HEYBURN concluded, Mr. Price, at the President's request, told why the forest service desired to create a big reserve in Shoshone County. He explained that some valuable timber remained; that much of the area had once been timbered, but had been denuded by fire, and said that without Government protection the remaining timber land would soon be denuded by lumbermen. Under Government care the existing forest would be preserved and the burned areas would in time become reforested. He then laid before the President a great collection of photographs, showing the type of country and the character of settlements. Instead of agricultural country, the land was unfit in every way for cultivation; instead of homes of bona fide settlers, the photographs showed rough huts built on a hundred or more claims by men who had located in the very best timber for the obvious purpose of getting the timber and deserting the land. Not a single house was found which was inhabited; not a single entry appeared to have been made in good faith."

Entry in good faith! The lands had never been opened to entry. There was no possible process by which a settler could initiate title upon those lands. This is simply a silly statement, a tissue of falsehoods and misstatements, and the fact that it purports to state what occurred at that private meeting stamps its origin and the spirit that inspired it. But I will proceed:

MR. ROOSEVELT ASTOUNDED.

"The President was astounded by what he saw. His interest increased as he went further through the pile of photographs."

I did not see these photographs, but I have seen the country.

"When he had seen enough he took out a bunch of photographs of the huts and waving them before the astonished Senator, fairly hissed:

"'Mr. HEYBURN, rich men don't build shacks.'"

That is quoted.

HEYBURN'S SECOND PLEA.

"That ended the conference, but it evidently did not subdue the junior Senator from Idaho. On April 6 Mr. HEYBURN addressed a lengthy letter to the President, renewing his protest against the creation of the Shoshone Reserve. In the letter Mr. HEYBURN again referred to the settlements which he insisted had been made in good faith within the reserve. He told how settlements abounded just outside the limits of the proposed reserve, and said they were gradually extending up the various streams, into the heart of the Shoshone country. Every year sees the settlements push farther up these streams, and there are now prosperous mining camps and growing settlements right in the very heart of the proposed reserve."

There was a judgment rendered within the last ten or fifteen days saying that that is true. One of the Departments of the Government, vested with judicial power to do so, has said that those mineral camps exist, and that that is a mineral country.

I read that to show the manner in which this contest has been carried on—not by the President. I feel perfectly free to say that the day I received that article I took it down and showed it to the President, and he denounced it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not go further than to say that the President denounced it in such unqualified terms that I have taken it for granted that the parties who were responsible for it were found and that they were called to account for it. Of course that kind of article could only have emanated from some of the representatives of the Bureau of Forestry, or other Department of the Government, who were present at that interview, and I have stated who were present when the interview took place.

I do not say this for the purpose of making any attack upon the President of the United States. I know that he desires and intends to execute this law fairly and for the best interests of the people; but I know that, like every other executive officer, he is more or less at the mercy of those subordinates on whom he must necessarily rely for information.

I have a right here, as I said in one of the letters which I wrote to the President and which I intend to read to the Senate before I am through with the discussion of this question, to speak of this matter. I said in one of those letters that, while in dealing with this question with the Departments or with the Executive I was speaking only as a private citizen, there was a forum where I could present this question to the country. I am here to-day for that purpose.

I am not here for the purpose of attacking the Administration; I am not here for the purpose of abusing it; I am not here for the purpose of discrediting it, but I am here for the purpose of indulging in that candid criticism in which it is my province and my right to indulge in discussing affairs connected with any department of the Government—executive, legislative, or judicial. I have the right to show, and I claim the privilege and the courtesy of the Senate while I show to them, that this law should be brought to the bar of justice.

I have introduced, and there is now pending before one of the committees of this body, a bill that provides that there shall be no more forest reserves created by Executive order; that Congress shall resume its constitutional functions and deal directly with the public lands, and that henceforth when forest reserves are to be created they shall be created by Congressional action.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator was so pressing in his desire to finish his thought that I did not want to interrupt him, but I should like now, if he will permit me, to recur to the statement of a newspaper about the President shaking a bunch of photographs in his face.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not true.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should not imagine it was; but I just wanted the Senator to give us his own statement in regard to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The interview was within the ordinary bounds of dignity and decorum, and there was neither excitement nor resentment nor lecture nor abuse nor defense. But I was there as a private citizen from the State of Idaho. My Senatorial functions do not require me or authorize me to go to the executive branch of the Government and either dictate or seek to control; but, as I said before, I started in to check the evil effects of this legislation as soon as it was enacted. I hope when I am through that the existing legislation will no longer be a part of the laws of this country.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question. What was the result of the interview? Was the reservation established or not?

Mr. HEYBURN. Which interview?

Mr. TELLER. The interview the Senator speaks of—that he has been detailing.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was requested to present my views in writing, which I did; and they are before the country in the shape of a brief.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not understand. Did they establish the reserve or not?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the one which is now on that map to be recommended on the 7th of next month.

Mr. TELLER. Oh!

Mr. HEYBURN. I have kept up a continual opposition to it.

I do not mean to be understood as claiming that I have prevented its establishment all these months, but I have kept up a continual opposition to it; and now I am up against the proposition that unless Congress acts or unless some notice or promise of action is sent out from this body, on the 7th of next month that fair country will be recommended for a forest reserve.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to say that if he had succeeded in defeating the proposition I should like to congratulate him, for on various occasions I have made that effort, and I have never yet succeeded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not care for this combination press bureau that has been organized for the purpose of blackening my character, in the hope that they might so degrade me that I might not have influence enough to represent the State which I have been elected to represent in part. As I say, I do not care for them, but I propose that this body and I propose that the country shall know exactly what they have done and the relation that I bear toward them. You can not possibly get at this from the right point of view without knowing something of the source from and the spirit in which these attacks emanate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to finish the expression, or it will be disconnected in the RECORD.

In pursuance of, and at the expense of the Government, this document [exhibiting], containing ninety pages, with some maps, called "Bulletin No. 67," has been issued and sent throughout the country. It might fairly be denominated "A Brief of the Forest Bureau against HEYBURN." [Laughter.]

Now I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I understand the Senator's position, he is complaining about the action of the Forestry Bureau in influencing the President to ignore the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have not done it, so that the Senator need not bother about it. They have not succeeded. These statements are not true simply because they are in the press.

Mr. TILLMAN. If this forest reservation is going to be ordered on the 7th of next month unless Congress acts, it looks to me as if the Senator has not got the square deal from the President which he ought to expect.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will be the first, probably, to complain of it if I have not a square deal from the President.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to understand the Senator's attitude. It looks to me like he is now complaining strenuously.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I want to say to the Senator, and I thought I had made myself plain, the President disapproved of the article when I showed it to him——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not speaking about the article.

Mr. HEYBURN. In most emphatic terms as being unfair and denounced it, and, I think, took steps to correct those who were responsible for it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not speaking of the article at all. I am speaking of the results. The Senator points to the map and states that a certain reservation will be ordered by the Executive by the 7th of next month unless something is done to relieve him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I say it will be recommended by the Chief Forester. I read the letter, so you have the language of it exactly. The Chief Forester notified me that on that day he will recommend it for withdrawal. I am free to say that I expect, unless Congress expresses itself directly or in a way that shall be understood, that it will be withdrawn. I undertake to say now it is not now open to settlement.

Mr. TILLMAN. When will the order providing for the withdrawal of this land from settlement and its being placed in a reserve go into effect?

Mr. HEYBURN. The reservation will go into effect as soon as the proclamation is issued, as the statutes provide.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am trying to get the Senator to enlighten us as to whether he expects the President to withhold that order, in accordance with his wishes and knowledge on the subject, or whether he expects that the President will recognize the Forestry Bureau against his recommendation. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not any expectations on the subject. I am not going to have any imaginary differences with the President of the United States. The relations between the President of the United States and myself are as friendly as should exist between a citizen of good standing and the Chief Magistrate. I am not here to make trouble or to run away from it. I am not going to conjure up any possible future difficulties out of the situation.

I read that article for the purpose of showing what the newspapers have said, not what the President has said or done. I read that article for the purpose of showing the spirit of the attack that had been made, in order to accomplish a given purpose. The President does not know of those things. The President's intentions are honest and his intentions are friendly toward the people of the State of Idaho and toward myself, and I am not here to apologize for or to defend the relations existing between the President and myself. I read that article with some reluctance, but I determined that I would not close this subject until the Senate knew something of the motive behind the attack that has been made in the press for the last two years directed against myself.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask him a question. The Senator exhibits what I thought to be a public document and declares that it ought to be entitled "The Forestry Division against HEYBURN."

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a public document.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator further declares that a Department of the Government is assiduously and deliberately engaged in an effort to discredit him for the manner in which he has sought to protect the interests of his constituents. To my mind, that is a most serious charge against the Executive Department of the Government. If the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator to permit me here. Why against the Executive Department of the Government?

Mr. BAILEY. Is not that an Executive Department of the Government??

Mr. HEYBURN. It is individuals in the Executive Department of the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator did not permit me to ask the question. I merely stated an introduction to the question. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he knows whether these transactions have been called to the attention of the President of the United States?

Mr. HEYBURN. I know that the transaction indicated by the newspaper article I have just read was called to the attention of the President of the United States by myself in person. I first sent it by letter, and I followed it up, and I took another copy of it and went down to the White House with it.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator know whether this public document, printed at the expense of the Government, has also been called to the attention of the President?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it has. I have not called it to his attention. I have passed that period now, inasmuch as Congress is in session, where I have to deal with this question from the standpoint of a private individual. Whatever I do in relation to the matter of forest reserves from this time on will be done here in the responsible forum of which I am a member.

Mr. BAILEY. With the permission of the Senator from Idaho, I will say that some persons who do not know so much about this particular question, but who are sincerely anxious to do whatever may be best for the people most immediately concerned, might not find it so easy to dismiss the matter as the Senator from Idaho seems willing to do. He protests his confidence in the President, and I want to know for my own information, and probably as influencing my action upon this matter, whether or not it is true that the President of the United States knows that appointees within his jurisdiction and under his power are using their office for the purpose of attacking and discrediting a Senator, as the Senator says is the case at bar. If the President does know that and has made no removal, I think it presents a very serious question, and I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho whether or not any of the parties concerned in this propaganda against him have been removed from their office?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator not know if they had been removed?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think I would know, because I have not been to the Department and I have not cared enough about their action to make me go down there, nor have I the slightest intention of going there.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I do not think it is worth all the time necessary to call it to the attention of the Senate and the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senate can deal with these questions. The Senator from Texas is in a position to deal with these questions as readily as I am. There are different ways of meeting issues in life. One man meets them in one way and another in another. I choose to meet this issue of the attack upon me in the way I have met it here to-day. I am not going to enter into a squabble in the newspapers. I am not going to introduce sensational resolutions for inquiries. I do not care whether these three men, whose sole business it is to send out literature and conduct a press bureau for the purpose of recommending the acts of the forestry service to the people of the United States, are there or not. I am not responsible for the conduct of the executive department of the Government. They are as responsible to the country as we are. I have their names; I know who they are; but I am not here to make an attack on them.

I have called the attention of the executive department of the Government to them, and that is where my jurisdiction and that is where the jurisdiction of the Senate end. We have no right to "investigate" those men. They are responsible alone to the head of the executive department, and he is responsible to the country.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Idaho is quite right in saying that we deal with these matters according to our own views, but surely there can be no difference of opinion among Senators or among fair-minded men outside of the Senate as to the gross impropriety, not to say the indecency, of a bureau of the executive department of this Government deliberately, sedately, and continuously pursuing a Senator with the purpose of discrediting him. Now, what I complain about, if I complain at all, is that the Senator from Idaho denounces these men; denounces the statements contained in the newspaper as falsehood; he denounces the men who conduct this attack upon him, but with a party loyalty which perhaps may do him credit as a partisan, he continually exempts the President. I say that if the President of the United States has had his attention called to this misconduct and has not removed the men guilty of it, then all the Senator says against these men can be said with justice against the President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not care to be diverted into that channel. I did not come here to defend myself against any statements that have been made by this combination. I do not ask anything at the hands of the country or of the Senate because of these statements or of their falsity. I merely incorporated them into my remarks for the purpose of meeting whatever influence the press may have upon the minds of those to whose attention such statements have been called during the last year or more so far as this question has been before the public, and I will return to the consideration of the real question.

I wish to redirect the minds of Senators to this proposition: The executive department of the Government, because of a misinterpretation of law, has undertaken to take possession of lands in Idaho, the fee simple of which rests in the State of Idaho for educational purposes. The executtive department threatens to take possession of more lands belonging to the State of Idaho in fee simple and convert them into a forest reserve; and I want the Congress of the United States to stay this action, either by reporting and enacting the bill which is now pending here, or by such other steps as will effectuate that purpose. I want those lands which belong to the State of Idaho kept for the State of Idaho for the purpose for which they were given to the State of Idaho by the Government—that is, for the public schools.

Our admission act and the constitution of Idaho provide that these lands can not be sold for less than $10 per acre. It was intended that the State should sell them as they grew in value. Some of them are not now worth that much, but by reason of the growth of the country about them their value will be enhanced and they will be worth it. Other timber lands which have been included in forest reserves are worth many times that price.

There is another thing in connection with that. They are creating forest reserves in Idaho for the purpose of providing pasture. They are creating forest reserves in Idaho that contain no forests and they are doing it at the demand of those who are interested in grazing upon those lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me? Some time ago I inquired of the Senator the value placed on these lands per acre. I understand the Senator to say that the minimum value is $10 an acre?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. If there are 15,000,000 acres in a forest reserve, it would be $150,000,000?

Mr. HEYBURN. Only one-eighteenth of it is school land. Two sections out of a township makes one-eighteenth. It would be considerably over $10,000,000 for the school lands.

I did not introduce this bill expecting that the State should be paid out of the Public Treasury $10 an acre for all these school sections. I introduced the bill more particularly for the purpose of calling the attention of Congress and the country to the fact that these lands were being taken and to stop the taking. The State of Idaho can go into court and recover those lands against the Government or the grantee of the Government, but the State of Idaho has not done so, and the error is not upon the State up to date, but it is upon the part of the executive department that has gone into possession of the lands and laid claim to them, and excluded settlement and enterprise from them to the detriment of the prosperity and growth of the State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I direct the Senator's attention to a statement which he has just made, which I am not quite sure I properly understood, and which, if I did understand it correctly, is grave with importance. He said, as I remember—and I rise to ask whether I am right—that certain forest reserves which had no forests in them, but were merely grazing lands, had been created at the requests of those interested, to wit, the people who grazed cattle on them.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is right, strictly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That cattlemen have requested the Government to make forest reserves out of land purely for grazing purposes, for their personal benefit.

Mr. HEYBURN. I made that charge, and that charge is true, and forest reserves are being created that have no forests in them in order to facilitate grazing and grazing privileges to those who are fortunate enough to get contracts for them.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator would like to have it understood by the Senate or the country at large that all of the land within this forest reserve is worth $10 an acre.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit, I do not want to be diverted from a line of discussion to go back to the question of the value of those lands. Of course all land to-day is not worth as much as it will be at some other time in the future, but with the growth and settlement of the State around these sections of land, which by the wisdom of the policy of their designation are all of them surrounded by land that does not belong to the State, one element of the community builds up another, just as in the case of the granting of alternate sections to the railroads. The purpose of that provision in the law was that the railroads, in selling their land, would not sell it in solid blocks and leave other large solid blocks isolated. It is the alternate principle, the community principle—one building or tending to build up another—the land not within the alternate sections being open to the homesteader without price, and the land within the railroad sections being open to the man who had more money and was able to go in there and pay his way.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the senior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think my colleague was a little bit misunderstood in regard to the $10 proposition. The General Government granted Idaho certain lands for certain purposes when Idaho was admitted to statehood, and our constitutional convention, of which my colleague was a distinguished member, put in our constitution a clause that no land belonging to the State, presented by the General Government, should be sold for less than $10 an acre.

Mr. HEYBURN. The grant of lands was made after the constitution was adopted. Idaho adopted a constitution, and came to Congress for admission. It was admitted as a State with the constitution as it stands to-day, with the exception of a few amendments that have been made since. So the constitution became a part of the act of Congress admitting the State, because it was approved by the act of Congress and it was incorporated in the spirit of the admission bill. And under that school lands can not be sold for less than $10 an acre. Sections 16 and 30 came by direct grant. Other lands that were granted the State at the time of the admission were not grants in presenti, but were subject to selection, and the grant would not attach until the land was selected and designated. But that is not true of sections 16 and 36.

If you will examine the statutes, you will find that Utah came in under an enabling act, and Judge Marshall held that the title attached after the land had been surveyed, and left open the question whether the grant would attach to unsurveyed land. But Idaho has a direct clause—not "there shall be granted," as it is in the case of Utah. As to Idaho, it is "there is hereby granted," bringing it within the cases construing the law as to railroad lands, where it has been held that those were words of present grant, and that Congress lost its jurisdiction over the land as soon as the bill became a law. The same was held in the case of Borden v. Northern Pacific Railroad Company. That doctrine is settled.

Now, that being true, these lands belonging to Idaho, any act on the part of the Executive, on the part of Congress, or on the part of any branch of the Government in attempting to take that title away or to interfere with its enjoyment or its use violates the rights of the State, violates that principle of the Constitution of the United States which I think perhaps has not been closely observed at all times even by the lawmaking body of the country—the last clause of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution, which is a very important one—where it says:

Nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State.

The last provision, "or of any particular State," is just as sacred in that it protects the rights of the State in this property as it is in that it recognizes and protects the rights of the General Government to its property.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the title of the State of Idaho is as perfect to sections 16 and 36 as the Senator claims it to be under the Constitution and the enabling act, will not a proper suit determine that fact?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. And give to the State of Idaho the full benefit of its title?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then why this bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. But will Congress stand by and see a part of the machinery of the National Government cloud and encumber and delay the title of the State by a misinterpretation of something that can be made plain by a stroke of the pen in a statute? One of the functions of this legislative body is that where laws are being misapplied they will be amended and the executive department will be directed as to the proper application of the principles that Congress intended to incorporate into the law.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understand the purpose of this bill is to enable the State of Idaho to take lands in lieu of those included within the forest reservation?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then I misunderstood the proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no provision of law to allow it to take lands in lieu of those to which title has passed. There is a distinct provision and a judicial interpretation of law that says that neither the Interior Department nor the executive department has the right to exchange lands. It is like that transaction which was made between the Interior Department and the claimants of alternate sections in the San Francisco forest reserve. There was no more authority of law to warrant the making of that contract than there would be to make this trade between the lands in the State of Idaho and the Government. The State of Idaho has a constitution which says that public lands may be disposed of only at public sale upon certain notice, under certain conditions, at a certain place, for a certain price, and there is no alternative provision for it. The legislature of Idaho can not authorize the trading of lands, and the executive department of the United States has not that jurisdiction over the public lands, notwithstanding all the acts of Congress that will authorize it, to trade the lands of the United States for chips or whetstones or land somewhere else.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I want the Senator's indulgence to ask him a question outside the order of his argument just at present. I was profoundly interested in the statement he made, about which I asked his verification, which was that forest reserves were being created where there were none, but where there was purely grazing ground, for the personal benefit of those who could graze their cattle on them.

I have been talking to some of the Senators here from various States in whose States the great forest reserves are found, and I will ask the Senator, from what I understand in conversation with these other Senators, if this is not the fact; that between two mountains there will be a valley, in which there are no trees, but which is included in the forest reserve? I ask the Senator if that is not the grazing land to which he refers, and if the grazing upon this land by cattlemen is not let—rented—to them for compensation? If that be the case, nothing could be more proper, and thus a charge which appeared to me at first to be serious is at once explained. Is that the case?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is that the case, I ask the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am going to answer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. All right.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not the condition to which I referred. It is more than probable that that condition exists too. The statements from the local communities are sometimes pretty safe criterions. Here is an article to which I wish to call attention:

CATTLEMEN WANT RANGE—CLAIM SHEEP MEN OCCUPY ALL DESIRABLE TERRITORY, THEREBY PREVENTING CATTLE AND HORSES FROM GRAZING.

Council is in what I may call the "semiarid" region of the State, up near Payette Lake, one of the most beautiful sections of the State. Cattle and horses and stock of all kinds are there in large quantities.

A meeting of the farmers of this section is in progress to-day for the formulation of a petition to be forwarded to Major Fenn, forest superintendent for Idaho, asking him to set aside a strip of ground along the south border of this valley for the exclusive ranging of horses and cattle belonging to the settlers of this vicinity. This step has been made necessary by the action of the sheep men, who have heretofore wholly disregarded the rights of the settlers and have allowed their flocks to range indiscriminately over the entire section, thereby denuding the range of sustenance for the horses and cattle of the settlers.

Then it goes on and elaborates. Then here is another one:

ADDING TO THE FOREST RESERVES—STOCKMEN AND SETTLERS PETITIONING FOR ADDITIONS TO SAVE THE RANGE COUNTRY FROM OUTSIDE INVASION.

An official letter has been received by Forest Supervisor Fenn that the petition of numerous settlers and stockmen, asking that two and one-half townships be added to the east side of the Sawtooth Reserve, had received favorable action by the Department, and that a proclamation would issue in the near future creating the addition. The lands embraced in the townships are located on what is known as "Lime Creek."

Another contemplated addition to the Sawtooth, and for which petitions are now being circulated, asks that the lines be extended east to the Pahsimeria Valley.

Letters are being received from settlers and stockmen in the vicinity of Council, Salubria, and the country west of those places, asking what steps are necessary to secure the establishment of the Seven Devils Reserve, and also that additions be made to the territory covered by the Weiser Reserve.

I read that just to show how selfish interests are taking advantage of this condition, and how reserves have been created that will give them exclusive rights under contract for grazing. Now, then, I will add that I am advised, informally, that at a very early day they will apportion the range among the sheep men, determining how many sheep may range in a certain section and how many cattle may range in a certain section, giving them exclusive right to apportion it among the men who apply. They have a rule of precedence. They destroy the public range. They give men special privileges upon the public range. They charge them a slight fee for it. It is immaterial whether they charge them anything or not, but the principle I object to is that of exclusion.

If the Government makes a contract to-day that it will give certain stockmen the exclusive privilege to range within certain bounds for one year or five years, it means that when the settler comes along with his white-covered wagon and his family he does not stop in that part of the State; he is warned that he could not for at least five years, or for the term of the lease, secure a foothold here.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I presume the Senator from Idaho does not wish the Senate to understand that the Government is renting its lands outside of forest reserves to cattlemen?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but they are creating forest reserves where there is little or no timber, and because they have created such forest reserves they are renting the range to these cattlemen and sheep men. They are good citizens; I know them; but they have been actuated, like many other men, by the principle of self-gain. They want that range extended because they can make a contract for grazing through the forester, and after that forester has approved of their application it will be granted to them and they will then have an exclusive right to range. I will not undertake to say what proportion of each range is timbered and what is not, but I will undertake to say that these ranges that are asked for are not timber ranges; they are simply pasture grounds.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Idaho understands that the lands which are included in the forest reserves are those over which sheep and cattle had ranged before?

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARREN. And I presume the Senator understands, as we all know, that there has been up to the present year no charge made, but now a charge is made per head, and not as to any particular locality. So the preference, if any, is to those who may pay a rental upon a certain number of head of cattle or sheep to range in a certain forest reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will find that now the territory is apportioned on general lines. I have here a circular, but I will not go into that. I do not wish to detain the Senate longer to-day. This is a large subject, and while it may not interest all Senators, yet it is one that interests a large proportion of the people. It involves the question of the right and the power of Congress and the duty of Congress to resume its constitutional powers. It involves the growth of our States in the West. Whenever you establish a forest reserve you put up the sign "No thoroughfare" to the man who is in search of a home, and there are thousands of them yet going there. The men who went into Iowa and Indiana and Illinois and Nebraska and Wisconsin and Minnesota and made their homes and raised their families are sending out the surplus sons to our country, and they are seeking homes, just as their fathers hunted them, and they are looking for the best they can get. There should not be one acre of the public domain withdrawn from the choice of those people. Had it been done fifty years ago a number of the great States of to-day would have made a very poor showing compared with what they do to-day in growth and prosperity?

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I am only propounding questions to get information. I am very much interested in this subject. My State is very much interested in it. I wish to find whether the conditions in Idaho are different from the conditions in other States. Does the Senator maintain that the creation of these forest reserves is for the purpose of giving control of the land to cattlemen and to sheep men?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I charge no ulterior or vicious motives to these men. I am talking of results and facts. I am not making an attack upon the individuals. I suppose they are acting up to their lights, up to the best they know, up to what they believe is right. Of course they are; but that is no reason why I should sit mutely here and see a wrong done, if we conceive it to be a wrong. Our function here is to keep a watchful eye upon the Government in all its branches, and wherever error seems to have grown up to correct it.

In closing for to-day, at least I just want to emphasize this proposition, that behind all of my objection, over and aside from all of the details that have entered into this discussion, is the question of an open door in that western country for the miner, the farmer, the fruit grower, the cattleman, and the sheep man. I want the natural resources to be available when he comes knocking at our door looking for a home. I do not want any signs of "No thoroughfare" up in the State. We have to have Indian reservations. They are limited both as to quantity and as to use, and we are opening them gradually from time to time. They are all right. We have to have military reservations to accommodate the military forces of our country. We have to withdraw temporarily, under existing laws, certain sections of land that are to be applied to the reclamation service.

I was asked by one Senator as to how much of the country I would consent to have within forest reserves. I would not withdraw one acre of the country from the right of settlement on the part of the immigrant, the man who is seeking a home. If he wanted to live on the top of Stevens Peak, I would allow him to exercise his right to do so and occupy the land of his choice; and I would allow this settlement to creep gradually from the valleys up these mountains.

How do these pioneers according to their inclinations select? The man from the mountain goes to the mountain. The man who is accustomed to the prairies is apt to seek the prairies and the wheat fields of Latah, Nez Perces, and Idaho counties or other lands of that character. The man who came from the lowland country will go into the river valleys. They will seek something of the same character as that with which they had become familiar. So it results in a very intelligent, a very beneficial, and a very fortunate diversification of the population throughout the State. The very fact that men will live in these mountains is established by the fact that they do live in them. The complaint is made that these people trespass. What they call trespass is in reality the expression of choice on the part of people as to place of residence. I believe the rule to be applied to them was laid down by the Supreme Court. I have referred several times to the case of Harrington v. Chambers, where the Supreme Court of the United States said that the judgment and faith of the miner should govern, and I believe the rule applied to mining claims should apply to all classes of the public land.

Now, we are met with a proposition that men can not be trusted; that if you give them that right they will steal. That is a contention on the part of the executive department of the Government, if it ever made it or ever offered it, of inefficiency to execute the laws or else it is a charge that Congress has not wisely made the laws. It is one or the other.

Now, Mr. President, at this point, when I am compelled by reason of the lateness of the hour to leave this question, I hope it will not be dismissed from the minds of Senators or be allowed to rest. It is a fruitful field for consideration, investigation, and discussion, and it offers an opportunity for wise determination on the part of the Senate that will cure this evil. This will cure it. Let no more reserves be made until Congress has had a chance to investigate the result of the application of the law which it passed, a little unconsidered amendment to an act that was not intended to include this subject at all, a little insufficiently considered amendment, that has resulted in carving out from the body of this country an area larger than the Middle and New England States combined, and that has carved out of Idaho 27.3 per cent of her territory just as good as that that is outside of the reserves. There are mountains and valleys, timber and water, and a climate that constitute the possibilities of settlement and home making. All it needs is the people. Give them a chance to go in there and go in there under a right and not by the grace of a privilege. The American citizen does not take kindly to being compelled to ask somebody's consent to do that which he and his forefathers have enjoyed the right to do under the law. Many questions bearing on the subject of discussion and which I intended to discuss must be deferred to another time because of the lateness of the hour. Much of the time that I had intended to devote to the consideration of them has been taken by the questions interposed, which I have been pleased to have asked and to answer.

Now, Mr. President, while I have not nearly covered all of the ground that should be discussed in considering this question, I will not at this time ask that the bill be referred, but I will ask that it remain upon the table for further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, it is not very often that I differ with my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN], and it is with extreme regret that I am compelled to do so on this occasion. I think we have almost always voted together, and I think I may say we always vote together where the interests of Idaho are concerned. We have done so in the past, and I think we will do so in the future.

But in regard to this proposition I differ radically and totally with my colleague. So far as those newspaper articles are concerned, I know little about them; they are the correspondents of Republican newspapers. In regard to the publication of the pamphlet by the Agricultural Department, I am inclined to think the Agricultural Department might have gotten the consent of my colleague before publishing that correspondence. That, however, is a question of propriety or ethics to be determined between the President and my colleague. There is a letter in that pamphlet from me to the President, published without my consent also. I have no objection to its publication, and never doubted the propriety of its publication, although never consulted about it. I will ask the Secretary to read a circular from the Department of Agriculture, and I will ask Senators to listen to it, because I think it is a complete answer to everything my colleague has said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1905.

The FORESTER, Forest Service.

SIR: The President has attached his signature to the following act:

"An act providing for the transfer of forest reserves from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture shall, from and after the passage of this act, execute or cause to be executed all laws affecting public lands heretofore or hereafter reserved under the provisions of section 24 of the act entitled 'An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, and acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof, after such lands have been so reserved, excepting such laws as affect the surveying, prospecting, locating, appropriating, entering, relinquishing, reconveying, certifying, or patenting of any of such lands.

"SEC. 2. That pulp wood or wood pulp manufactured from timber in the district of Alaska may be exported therefrom.

"SEC. 3. That forest supervisors and rangers shall be selected, when practicable, from qualified citizens of the States or Territories in which the said reserves, respectively, are situated.

"SEC. 4. That rights of way for the construction and maintenance of dams, reservoirs, water plants, ditches, flumes, pipes, tunnels, and canals, within and across the forest reserves of the United States, are hereby granted to citizens and corporations of the United States for municipal or mining purposes, and for the purposes of the milling and reduction of ores, during the period of their beneficial use, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to the laws of the State or Territory in which said reserves are respectively situated.

"SEC. 5. That all money received from the sale of any products or the use of any land or resources of said forest reserves shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States and for a period of five years from the passage of this act shall constitute a special fund available, until expended, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for the protection, administration, improvement, and extension of Federal forest reserves.

"Approved, February 1, 1905."

By this act the administration of the Federal forest reserves is transferred to this Department. Its provisions will be carried out through the forest service, under your immediate supervision. You have already tentatively negotiated the transfer with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose powers and duties thus transferred I assign to you. Until otherwise instructed, you will submit to me for approval all questions of organization, sales, permits, and privileges, except such as are intrusted by the present regulations to field officers on the ground. All officers of the forest reserve service transferred will be subject to your instructions and will report directly to you. You will at once issue to them the necessary notice to this effect.

In order to facilitate the prompt transaction of business upon the forest reserves and to give effect to the general policy outlined below, you are instructed to recommend at the earliest practicable date whatever changes may be necessary in the rules and regulations governing the reserves, so that I may, in accordance with the provisions of the above act, delegate to you and to forest reserve officers in the field so much of my authority as may be essential to the prompt transaction of business and to the administration of the reserves in accordance with local needs. Until such revision is made the present rules and regulations will remain in force, except those relating to the receipt and transmittal of moneys, in which case special fiscal agents of this Department will perform the duties heretofore rendered by the receivers of local land offices in accordance with existing laws and regulations. The chief of records, forest service, is hereby designated a special fiscal agent, and you will direct him at once to execute and submit for my approval a bond for $20,000.

On December 17, 1904, the President signed the following order:

"In the exercise of the power vested in the President by section 1753 of the Revised Statutes and acts amendatory thereof:

"It is ordered, That all persons employed in the field and in the District of Columbia in the 'protection and administration of forestry reserves in or under the General Land Office of the Interior Department' be classified and the civil-service act and rules applied thereto, and that no person be hereafter appointed, employed, promoted, or transferred in said service until he passes an examination in conformity therewith, unless specifically exempted thereunder. This order shall apply to all officers and employees, except persons employed merely as laborers, and persons whose appointments are confirmed by the Senate."

This order classifies the whole forest-reserve service, now transferred, and places it under the civil-service law.

In the administration of the forest reserves it must be clearly borne in mind that all land is to be devoted to its most productive use for the permanent good of the whole people and not for the temporary benefit of individuals or companies. All the resources of forest reserves are for use, and this use must be brought about in a thoroughly prompt and businesslike manner, under such restrictions only as will insure the permanence of these resources. The vital importance of forest reserves to the great industries of the Western States will be largely increased in the near future by the continued steady advance in settlement and development. The permanence of the resources of the reserves is therefore indispensable to continued prosperity, and the policy of this Department for their protection and use will invariably be guided by this fact, always bearing in mind that the conservative use of these resources in no way conflicts with their permanent value.

You will see to it that the water, wood, and forage of the reserves are conserved and wisely used for the benefit of the home builder first of all, upon whom depends the best permanent use of lands and resources alike. The continued prosperity of the agricultural, lumbering, mining, and live-stock interests is directly dependent upon a permanent and accessible supply of water, wood, and forage, as well as upon the present and future use of these resources under businesslike regulations, enforced with promptness, effectiveness, and common sense. In the management of each reserve local questions will be decided upon local grounds; the dominant industry will be considered first, but with as little restriction to minor industries as may be possible; sudden changes in industrial conditions will be avoided by gradual adjustment after due notice, and where conflicting interests must be reconciled the question will always be decided from the standpoint of the greatest good of the greatest number in the long run.

These general principles will govern in the protection and use of the water supply, in the disposal of timber and wood, in the use of the range, and in all other matters connected with the management of the reserves. They can be successfully applied only when the administration of each reserve is left very largely in the hands of the local officers, under the eye of thoroughly trained and competent inspectors.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. DUBOIS. This is a circular letter of instruction from the Secretary of Agriculture to the Forester, with the authority of the President of the United States, in which it is set forth in plain language that the interests of the agriculturist, the laboring men, the grazing men, the miners, shall all be considered first; that these forest reserves are created in their interest, and that rules and regulations shall be passed, and the administration shall be so carried on that all these various peoples and interests in our State will be the beneficiaries. Unless you start out with the assumption that the President of the United States and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Forester intend to deceive, that they are not in earnest, the circular is a sufficient answer to what my colleague has said. I myself believe the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Forester mean to carry out the law in accordance with their openly proclaimed and published promises and instructions. I believe they intend to aid and not retard present and future development of our State.

Areas included in forest reserves by proclamation of the President can be excluded from existing forest reserves by exactly the same procedure. As a matter of fact these changes, which in the case of some of the earlier reserves have become advisable through the inclusion of agricultural land, have been and are now being made. The boundaries of all forest reserves can be changed and are being changed without any delay when they are found to include land more valuable for agricultural purposes than for forestry purposes.

Personally I have found the Forest Service more than willing to extend immunity to settlers who were upon the land before the reserve was created and who, through negligence or mistake, have failed to obtain a valid settlement claim. In two distinct instances which have come to my personal attention the Forest Service has instructed its supervisor not to interfere with settlers who were there previous to the establishment of the reserve, but who have no legal claim and are therefore technically trespassers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DUBOIS. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I understand—and I direct the Senator's attention to it—that he does not agree with the statement of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the Government has created forest reserves out of grazing grounds for the purpose of privately benefiting grazing and cattlemen?

Mr. DUBOIS. I never heard that statement until it was made on the floor to-day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator, as I understand, does not agree to that statement?

Mr. DUBOIS. I think I am pretty familiar with all the forest reserves in Idaho. I went over and criticised the objection of my colleague to each of them in detail, and I do not know of any forest reserve having been created for such a purpose. It is new to me that any forest reserve in Idaho was created for the benefit of stockmen. It has been supposed that owners of large herds of sheep have objected to their creation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say I am very glad to hear that disavowal, because the statement caught my particular attention.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator what will this settler, with his family and his worldly goods all around him, do while his application to settle upon this land is being considered and reviewed and sent to Washington and the land released? Will he not go somewhere else, where the land is not tied up, where it has no burden of delay upon it, and find his home?

Mr. DUBOIS. They are not including agricultural land within the reserves; and if some one happens to be settled on agricultural land where a reserve is created, taking his land into the reserve does not disturb the settler in the slightest degree.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was referring to the man the Senator referred to, who finds agricultural land within a forest reserve, who would like to have it, and makes application to have it segregated. How is he going to occupy his time while all the machinery of the law is being put in motion to secure that segregation?

Mr. DUBOIS. They certainly will not include that land within the reservation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not more probable that he would go elsewhere?

Mr. DUBOIS. Very often, as in the case referred to by my colleague in his own country, those numerous people who built houses attempted to take that land under the homestead act; but I was informed at the Department that those people could not take it under the homestead act because it was not land that could be homesteaded; that they could not take it under the timber and stone act because the land had not been surveyed, and they could not make a homestead filing because it was not agricultural land.

Mr. HEYBURN. That would have been determined when they came to enter, I presume.

Mr. DUBOIS. I presented their statement to the forester and tried to get relief for them. In their statement they did not claim that this land, of which my colleague speaks, in Shoshone County, was agricultural land. They based their plea for relief on other grounds, and I tried to aid them to retain their claims to these timber lands. The mountain sides there are as steep as these walls, pretty nearly straight up and down, near the town of Wallace, where my colleague lives. It is impossible to make farms on them.

As I have said, as a matter of fact, there are no agricultural lands, to speak of, within the forest reserves in Idaho. So far as grazing is concerned, everybody in Idaho, unless, perhaps, it may be a few of the large sheep owners, is in favor of these reserves. Why? Under the regulations of the Department, a permit is issued to a sheep owner to run a certain number of sheep within the reserve. That permit is given first to the one nearest the reserve, and the next permit to the next nearest, and so on until the last served are those who do not live in the State at all. The number of permits is held down, so that the range is not destroyed by overgrazing, but is preserved from one year to another. This is distinctly in the interest of the cattlemen and of the sheep men of our State, and I am sure they understand and appreciate this fact.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to inquire what is the object of the forest reserves in Idaho as respects the water courses and rivers in that State, and especially the great river that runs through the State?

Mr. DUBOIS. I shall be glad to answer, but first I wish to say, as I see one of the Senators from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is here, that some of their distinguished citizens, after having used up all the good forest land in Wisconsin—the Weyerhouser Company—came out to Idaho and now own half a million acres of the finest white-pine timber in the world, nearly all located in north Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he refers to the same Mr. Weyerhouser, who about a week ago was elected one of the vice-presidents of the Forestry Congress here in Washington, that is supposed to take care of, protect, and guard these forest reserves?

Mr. DUBOIS. I presume so. I do not care to have any more syndicates get a half million acres of our timber land, however, and they can not under the forestry reserve policy, no matter whether they profess to advocate the policy or not. Our timber is going pretty rapidly. That is the fact mostly in north Idaho. The Weyerhouser Company are building a railroad 47 miles long and are going to put in mills, which will employ 2,500 hands. They care nothing for Idaho. They will cut the timber off the land and destroy the forest, and it will not reforest. After they have done that they will leave the State and go somewhere else. We want to preserve these forest lands for the present population of Idaho and for future generations.

In south Idaho another question is involved, more important than the commercial value of the timber—and I am glad the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] asked me the question and I should be glad to have any Senator ask me questions—in south Idaho we have absolutely reached the limit of our water supply. We have not enough of water now to irrigate the lands where ditches have been built. We must immediately store water in Jacksons Lake, at the head of Snake River, in order to supply the land now under ditches along the Snake River of which the Senator from Iowa speaks. There is no opportunity for us to get enough water. Although we are one of the best-watered of the arid States, there is not nearly enough of water, and never will be, not even with all available storage reservoirs, to supply our land, which would be highly productive if we had an adequate water supply.

These forest reserves are absolutely necessary for the conservation of the water supply. If they are not created at the heads of the streams, the forests will be taken off, the water will come down in floods in the spring, and there will not be enough of it when it is needed in the middle of the summer months and in autumn. Forest reserves and irrigation are inseparable, and successful irrigation can not be maintained without forest reserves in these arid regions. There is not a Senator here from an arid section who does not know that that is true.

There is nothing to prevent a prospector from going anywhere on a forest reserve. There is not a single, solitary rule or regulation to prevent that. The regulations contained in the Forest Reserve Manual, from which my colleague read, have been obsolete for eighteen months, and the circular which he read was issued by the Land Department to the registers and receivers of the Land Department and applied to mines and not to prospectors.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator from Idaho will give me credit for having called attention to the fact that the book was obsolete. I was merely exhibiting it as a specimen of the management with which I had become familiar; but the circular I read as to present requirements is not obsolete.

Mr. DUBOIS. In all good nature, it seems to me that my colleague is discussing conditions which once existed, but which do not exist now. Senators here will recollect that for the last fifteen or twenty years those of us who are representatives of that western country have been inveighing more or less against forest reserves. This was especially so when they were first created.

They would segregate a great extent of country without sufficient investigation or care. We objected. We proposed this, that, and the other remedy and safeguard, until finally they have established rules and regulations that protect every industry in that country, and they are the rules and regulations which the western representatives have gotten them to adopt after long-continued and persistent effort. The regulations under the forest-reserve law, it seems to me, are the product of the constant efforts of these western representatives for fifteen or twenty years; and it does seem to me that they are most wise and useful.

The present Administration may, and doubtless does, make some mistakes in the numerous details of carrying on this great work, but they are so few and insignificant as compared with the great benefit which the policy confers on our whole people that they are entitled to the support of western representatives at least.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Idaho is not through.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator has not concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. The unfinished business was laid aside to allow the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to conclude his remarks, but I am entirely willing to yield further.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not intend to take up much of the Senate's time at this late hour.

I call attention to this fact, that these supervisors and these forest rangers are selected from the residents of the various States where they are to perform service.

The head of the forestry work in Idaho is F. A. Fenn, speaker of the first legislature of the State of Idaho. He was an officer in the Idaho battalion that served in the Philippines. His father was one of the early Delegates in Congress from Idaho. Major Fenn, who must be nearly 50 years of age, was born in Idaho, and has never lived any place else. He has always lived in the mining regions. The officers under him who are administering forest reserves in Idaho are citizens of Idaho. They have a direct interest in the State and in its people. They will live in Idaho when they sever their connection with the Forestry Bureau. They are not dudes or college graduates from the East, and it is not to be presumed fairly that they will do anything to embarrass or injure their neighbors and friends of a lifetime. It is the clearly defined policy of the Department, which policy is being executed, to have the officers of the reserves of the various States and Territories, from the superintendent down to the last ranger, selected from the residents of the respective States and Territories. All of the interests which they have in the world are bound to be in the prosperity of the State, and their nearest friends and kinsmen are the people of Idaho. From personal knowledge I know that they are among the very best in all respects of our citizenship.

Complaints do not come here as they used to, with all the red tape attendant and consequent delay, but a given case is settled immediately on the ground by a supervisor, who is a native of the State and knows the neighbors and who has an interest in them and in his own future. Anyone can go on these forest reserves and get all the lumber he wants. Any four of us, if we lived in Idaho, could enter into a combination and say, "We will erect a sawmill," and go on any forest reserve and get from the Government all the lumber we wanted; but we would be under certain rules and regulations which would preserve the forests. We would not be permitted to destroy them.

About one-third of Idaho has been burned out within the last fifty years. Four hundred million dollars' worth of lumber has thus been destroyed. The forest reserves will be patrolled, the trees will be protected from fires, and that enormous and continuing loss will be stopped.

Then, in the forest reserve roads and bridges are constructed—the Government taking that expense off of the hands of our pioneers. It builds roads and bridges all through the forest reserves. It is much easier to do any kind of business on a forest reserve than it is on the public domain. For instance, if you want to have a summer resort or a hotel or anything of that kind, you can get it at once on a forest reserve; whereas if it is on the public domain, it is a very difficult and cumbersome proposition.

The design of the forest reserve and the policy of the officers of the Department is to make it easy to the citizens in that country to get timber, to mine, and to do business on the reservation. There is no disposition whatever, so far as I have been able to see, nor is there any sign of it in any of their rules and regulations, to hinder the development of that country. On the other hand, the whole tendency is to make the development easier and more rapid.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood from the remarks of the Senator from Idaho that where agricultural lands had inadvertently been included within forest reserves it is still quite an easy matter to make settlement upon such agricultural lands. I ask the Senator from Idaho if it is not a fact that the settler is prohibited from settling upon such lands, and if it is not also a fact that people who are interested are now seeking a law at the hands of this Congress providing that settlers may go upon lands and homestead such lands as may be suitable for agricultural purposes within the forest reserves?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes. My statement was that, if it was shown that agricultural lands are within the temporarily withdrawn lands, they are released before the proclamation is issued, and the agricultural lands are not put into the reserve at all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But is it not also a fact that before the proclamation is issued there is seldom an opportunity to show that they are agricultural lands? Is it not true that when the forest-reserve policy was first inaugurated a set of rules and regulations was promulgated by the Interior Department, providing that before the forest reserve could be proclaimed there should be published in the newspapers of general circulation in the vicinity a notice that a forest reserve was under contemplation? Is it not also true that those rules have been abrogated; that now no notice is given; that really the first notice to the people of a State that a certain portion of their State is to be laid out into forest reserve is when the proclamation is made by the President of the United States, and that then, if it is found that agricultural lands have been inadvertently included, it is worth more than all the lands are worth to get them out from under the operation of that proclamation? In other words, is it not an exceedingly difficult process to take out from under the forest reserve lands once included therein? I do not know whether that has been the Senator's experience or not, but it has been the experience of some of us.

Mr. DUBOIS. It has not been my experience. The first step is the temporary withdrawal of the land. Then investigations are made and the agricultural lands are not put within the reserve. A very considerable time elapses between the temporary withdrawal and the proclamation of the President which creates the reserve. During this time everyone interested understands fully what lands it is contemplated and proposed to include within the reserve. My understanding and belief is that it is not designed to include agricultural land within any forest reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the junior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator says the first thing done is the withdrawal of the land from the reservation. At whose instance is this agricultural land pointed out as a subject for action by the Department? When the proclamation says "All persons are forbid making settlement upon this reservation," at whose instance can this segregation of the land inadvertently included be taken up? At the settler's? How does he get a footing there when he is forbidden to make settlement on it? I should like to have the Senator's idea of how he would go about securing a home upon agricultural land within a forest reserve.

Mr. DUBOIS. If the land is settled on when it is put in a reserve, the settler is not disturbed. If the land has not been settled on by anyone, and no one has tried to acquire any right to it, it certainly can not be very valuable agricultural land——

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator——

Mr. DUBOIS. But in their investigation, if the Department find that there is agricultural land there, or if anyone in the neighborhood says "You are including valuable agricultural land," and demonstrates that fact, then that land is not put into the reserve. But it can not be very valuable agricultural land if it has lain idle all the time and unclaimed until the reserve has been spread over it.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I would ask the Senator how can there be anybody in the neighborhood to point it out? In a reserve containing 3,000,000 acres, how can there be any neighbors to point this out when settlement upon the land is forbidden?

Mr. DUBOIS. There are as many neighbors there the day after the creation of the forest reserve as there were the day before.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not as many as there would be the next year, perhaps.

Mr. DUBOIS. As I have said repeatedly, the same power—that is, the Executive—which puts lands in forest reserves can take lands out of forest reserves, and will do so at any time on a showing of fact that lands are more valuable for agriculture than forestry.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the junior Senator from Idaho I would suggest that we have had a great deal of experience in our State with just such questions as he brings forth now. It has been solved in our State by the people who live adjacent to those reserves notifying me here that there were certain sections of land within the proposed forest reserve, or within the withdrawn area, that were agricultural lands, and they requested by petition here that those lands be withdrawn.

I want to say in behalf of the Bureau of Forestry that of all the petitions that have been sent here of that kind—and there have been numbers from the State of Utah—not a single one has been refused, and section after section has been withdrawn from proposed forest reserves upon petitions from people living adjacent to the proposed forest reserve.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] will pardon me a moment, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has been more fortunate in his experience than some of the rest of us. But I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that my former suggestion was called out by an experience in my own State, where settlement had been made on a forest reserve prior to its creation into a reserve, not under the homestead law, but settlement had been made with a design to take the land under the desert-land act. The terms of that act had been complied with so far as they could be complied with. Of course a man attempting to secure title under the desert-land act under those circumstances was wrong in the first instance, because it was unsurveyed land. The particular instance to which I refer was the experience of three families which had settled, hoping at the same time to get title when the land should be surveyed.

Prior to the running of the Government surveys over the land, but after it had been reclaimed and made productive, the Yellowstone Forest Reserve was created, covering the nearest spot where we hoped from Wyoming to give the Senator sufficient water for his beautiful farms in Idaho. The farmer who had made that settlement was notified, and it was held in the General Land Office, after proper proceedings before the local and General Land Office, that he absolutely had no title and could not hope to obtain title; that the land was in a forest reserve; and he was compelled to remove from there and abandon several years of hard labor in bringing in water.

I cite that merely as an illustration, and perhaps an unfortunate one, and entirely contrary to the one cited by the Senator from Utah. It simply shows the difficulty of getting these lands out of a reserve proclamation after their having been once placed there.

Mr. DUBOIS. There are comparatively few of such instances, I should think, as cited by the Senator from Wyoming, and it is not the design and has not been the practice of the Department to include or retain agricultural land within forest reserves. There may be exceptions, as indicated by the Senator from Wyoming, but they are rare. So far as there being a hundred and ten or a hundred and fifteen million acres of land in forest reserves, as complained of by my colleague, I do not see what difference it would make if there were 400,000,000 acres, provided the system is a good thing for the entire western country.

In my judgment, in Idaho there is not altogether—and I put a very large estimate on it—7,000,000 acres of agricultural land out of the 55,000,000 acres, and scarcely none of the land in forest reserves can ever be utilized for agriculture.

I assume that the same condition exists in other States, although of course I do not know as to the facts in regard to it. When I say 7,000,000 acres of agricultural land, I mean we can not possibly cultivate that much land in Idaho. There is not sufficient water in south Idaho to cultivate much more land than is already being provided for under our different irrigation projects. So, while 14,000,000 acres in forest reserves seems like a large amount, on the other hand, when you consider that there are 55,000,000 acres in all and only 7,000,000 of the entire number agricultural, it is not a very large amount, and you must bear in mind forest reserves are not only absolutely necessary for a continued and adequate water supply for at least half of these 7,000,000 acres, but they are also necessary for continued prosperity in mining, lumbering, and grazing.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he yields the floor. I desire to say in this connection that I shall wish to take up this subject some other time. It is too late now.

I want to ask whether the State of Idaho has availed itself to any extent of the privilege which has been exercised by other States of selecting lieu lands in place of sections 16 and 36 in forest reserves?

Mr. DUBOIS. I think not.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether there is any such authority?

Mr. WARREN. I will say that I think that authority has been exercised in other States.

Mr. PATTERSON. I never heard of it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I wish to keep the record correct. I did not quite understand the question of the Senator from Wyoming. Did he refer to sections 16 and 36 which had been occupied? If those are the ones to which he referred, the State has availed itself of the privilege of selecting lands in lieu of them.

Mr. WARREN. No. I wanted to know whether there had been any selection made or sought to be made in lieu of those lands that had been included in earlier forest reserves, set aside heretofore by proclamation.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think not. Although I believe by a ruling or decision of the Secretary of the Interior a State has a right to make selections in lieu of sections 16 and 36, if such sections are included or put into a forest reserve.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at 2 o'clock to-day there were three Senators ready to proceed with the discussion of this bill. I was very glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and the entire day has been consumed in this very interesting discussion.

I simply desire to say that to-morrow I will ask that the consideration of the bill be proceeded with at the hour of 2 o'clock to the exclusion perhaps of more interesting matters that might be urged upon me.

PRINTING OF MAP.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the map, copies of which Senators have, may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It can be photographed to page size and printed, and I think it is necessary to make plain the subject of to-day's discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks permission that the map which he has exhibited in the course of his speech to-day may be printed in the RECORD as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator can refer to but one map—the black and white map. He can not have the colored map printed. It would not be intelligible. He could not have it printed in green and yellow.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a small map. I think the Senator saw it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; the black and white map.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a photograph of that map. It can be photographed to the exact size needed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Do you propose to carry the colors in the photographic map?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. You can not have the colors printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. It will be black and white.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then you can not differentiate between forest reserves and the forest reserves that are to be.

Mr. HEYBURN. One of them is indicated by barred lines and the other by solid color.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and it is granted.

[The map referred to will be found in connection with Mr. HEYBURN'S speech, on page 1679.]

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 30, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

An act (S. 979) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Winnipeg, Yankton and Gulf Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Yankton, S. Dak.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INFORMATION FROM INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION IN REGARD TO FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

House resolution No. 131.

Whereas the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas in 1905, in their annual convention at Fort Worth, Tex., declared that the railroad companies carrying their live stock to the Kansas City, St. Louis, Chicago, and other markets had recently increased their freight rates to exorbitant figures, and that these advances amount to more than $1,000,000 per year to the live-stock industries of the State, over and above what the rates were and had been for a considerable period of time previous to the advances made, and the higher rates charged are for a poorer service than were the lower rates; and

Whereas said cattle raisers in said association further charged that the said live-stock rates are in excess by from 20 to 30 per cent of the live-stock rates charged to and from similarly situated territory in the Northwest for similar service under similar conditions, and that in that particular there is an unjust discrimination against the live-stock business in this State: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to transmit to this House for its guidance the following information, if not inconsistent with the public interests, namely:

First. What increases, if any, in railroad freight rates on live stock shipped to market from Texas have been made in the year 1905 over previous years, and what railroads, if any, have made such increased rates.

Second. What increases in freight rates, if any, have been made in said year over prior years on other important commodities shipped to or from the State of Texas.

Third. Whether the freight rates now charged on live stock shipped to market from Texas are in excess of live-stock rates charged to and from similarly situated and distant territory in the Northwest, for similar service, under similar conditions; and if there now is existing any unjust discrimination in freight rates against live-stock business of the State of Texas; and if so, to what extent the State of Texas is discriminated against in the shipment of live stock.

Fourth. Whether the State of Texas is discriminated against in the shipment of any commodities other than live stock, under the conditions mentioned in the above interrogatory No. 3; and if so, to what extent it is so discriminated against.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this resolution was reported by any committee?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was submitted to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and ordered to be printed on January 8, 1906. I will state to the gentleman when I drafted the resolution I supposed it would be a privileged resolution, simply asking for information, but it seems that in the Speaker's opinion it is not a privileged resolution, inasmuch as it was directed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is not the head of a Department. I hope, however, the gentleman from New York will have no objection to it, because the information is now in the possession of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PAYNE. I will state to the gentleman I have not any objection to the general object of the inquiry, but it seems to me that the resolution and the whereases in the preamble are very elaborate and call for a very extensive inquiry, and would be quite extensive, and if the resolution went to the committee they might report an amendment which might go more directly to the point desired by the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the gentleman that there are only four questions asked in these resolutions. The first is as to whether freight rates have been increased on the shipment of live stock from Texas to points on the Missouri River and Chicago. The second is whether recent increases of freight rates have been made in other commodities shipped to or from Texas over the same lines of railroads. The third is as to whether or not the same rate of freight is charged for the same distance of miles from Texas to those markets as are charged to freights coming from the Northwest and other points outside of Texas. There is no complication about this resolution. I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that in the Interstate Commerce Committee's report, made to Congress of date December 14, 1905, that this question of Texas freight rates is dealt with, and this is the way it is submitted by that committee: On page 18 of that report I find the following under the heading of "Hearings and investigations," viz:

Seventy-nine hearings and investigations of alleged violations of the act to regulate commerce have been had at general sessions of the committee in its office in Washington, D. C., and at special sessions held in Chicago, etc.

Among these seventy-nine I find these:

Advance in rates on live stock to points in Texas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Colorado, and Kansas to Kansas City, St. Joseph, South Omaha, St. Louis, Chicago, Fort Worth, New Orleans, Denver, and Pueblo. Terminal charge on live stock at Union Stock Yards, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. Speaker, the Commission investigated these charges, or alleged violations, and made the following decision thereon:

THE CATTLE-RATE CASE.

A case relating to the reasonableness of rates and involving very large interests is that of the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas v. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company et al. (11 I. C. C. Rep., 296), in which the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas appeared as complainant. Its members are engaged in live-stock operations in nearly every State and Territory west of the Missouri River except the Pacific Coast States. Practically all the railroad companies engaged in interstate transportation of live stock in which the members of the complainant association operate were made defendants.

The rates charged for such transportation of live stock were complained of as unjust and unreasonable. The case relates particularly to advances in rates on cattle from points north of the Texas quarantine line to northern ranges in Colorado, western Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, North and South Dakota, and also to advances in rates from points in Texas, Colorado, Wyoming, Arizona, Nebraska, Kansas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico to Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City. In the decision the advances in rates are shown in detail, commencing early in the year 1899, and to the various points mentioned some reductions are stated.

The Commission considered the cost to the carriers at originating and delivering points, cost and maintenance of equipment, expense of unloading and reloading in transit incident to feeding, watering, and resting the stock, character of the movement, number of cars in trains, the average loading, volume, and desirability of the traffic, the return of empty cars, the liability to damage, the cost of carriage, the increased cost of producing live stock, decreased selling price, method of making the advanced rates, disappearance of competition, cost of railroad labor and supplies, improved methods of operation and increased general traffic, mileage, revenue per car and per train, and other pertinent circumstances and conditions which need not be described.

The conclusion of the Commission was that the advances in live-stock rates made by the defendants dur'ng the year 1903 were unjust and unreasonable, and that to the extent of such advances the present rates are unjust and unreasonable.

A further ruling in this case was that the present terminal charge for the delivery of live stock at the Union Stock Yards in Chicago, amounting to $2 per car, is unjust and unreasonable, and that the reasonable charge would be $1 per car for such terminal services. This point was also involved as a main issue in another proceeding, a statement of which immediately follows.

THE CHICAGO LIVE-STOCK TERMINAL-CHARGE CASE.

This case is entitled "Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, complainant, and Chicago Live Stock Exchange, intervener, v. The Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway Company et al." (11 I. C. C. Rep., 277.) The decision last rendered by the Commission in this proceeding is the fourth the Commission has had occasion to make in the case. On June 1, 1894, the railways entering the city of Chicago imposed a charge of $2 per car for the delivery of live stock at the Union Stock Yards. Before that no charge was made for such delivery. On September 1, 1896, the Cattle Raisers' Association complained to the Commission, alleging the unlawfulness of this terminal charge, and on March 10, 1897, the Chicago Live Stock Exchange intervened in support of the complaint. Under the complaint and intervening petition this terminal charge as applied to all live-stock shipments delivered at the Union Stock Yards by the defendants was challenged.

After investigation the Commission decided that the charge was unreasonable to the amount of $1 per car, and stated that an order would be made requiring the carriers to cease and desist from continuing to impose the charge of $2. Subsequently the carriers filed a motion for rehearing, which, after further argument, was denied in a separate report and opinion. Thereupon an order was made pursuant to the original opinion, the question of reparation being reserved for future consideration. The defendants having refused to obey the order, legal proceedings were instituted for its enforcement, which finally resulted in the affirmance by the Supreme Court of the United States of the decree of the circuit court dismissing the petition of the Commission, but with a qualification.

The Supreme Court held that the Commission was right in its conclusion that the expense of delivery had been previously included in the through rate, and that the defendants were not justified in imposing the additional charge of $2 when the expense to them had only been increased by $1, and therefore the entire rate which the shipper was compelled to pay was $1 too high; but inasmuch as the rates from certain territory had been reduced by an amount much greater than the addition made by the terminal charge, the court was of the opinion that the rate was still favorable to the shipper, and since the report of the Commission left it doubtful whether this reduction from that particular territory, which amounted to 5 cents, applied to all the territory in question, or, if it applied to a part only, did not definitely define that part, the court could not enforce the order of the Commission as made, but was compelled to affirm the decree of the circuit court declining to enforce the order. The Supreme Court stated, however, in concluding its opinion that its decision and consequent decree were to be without prejudice to the right of the Commission to subsequently proceed with respect to any territory to which the reductions did not apply.

In February, 1903, the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas and the Chicago Live Stock Exchange filed a petition asking permission to proceed with the matter of reparation, and also to reopen the case, with a view to defining the territory to which the reduction of 5 cents did not apply and making an order in respect to that territory. This petition was granted, and the defendants were notified to file such answers in the premises as they might desire. The defendants, instead of answering, filed a motion to vacate the order of the Commission to proceed with the matter of reparation and to reopen the case. Thereupon the Commission rendered another decision, and held that the matter of reparation was not connected with nor controlled by the order to cease and desist, and that in its original decision the Commission had expressly reserved the subject of reparation for further consideration; and that while a decision upon the order to desist might be of such a character as to necessarily control the awarding of reparation, it was in no sense an adjudication of that subject. It was therefore held that the Commission might properly proceed with that branch of the case.

The Commission also held, with respect to the order to cease and desist, that all territory over which the reduction of 1896 applied to the original case was ended and no further steps could be had, but that it was still open to the Commission to inquire what that territory was and to proceed with respect to territory not embraced in those limits to correct the unreasonable rates produced by the exaction of this $2 charge.

The decision last rendered in this case shows that the matter of reparation was further held in abeyance, and that the only branch of the case for determination was that relating to an order for the future. This involved two questions of fact: First. To what territory did the reduction of 5 cents in October, 1896, apply? Second. As to the remaining territory had the rates to Chicago become so low that the addition of the $2 terminal charge was not unjust and unreasonable? Some other matters were also considered by the Commission. The general findings and rulings of the Commission in this case are briefly stated as follows:

A railroad company may maintain its live-stock depot at a particular point, although it neither builds nor repairs nor insures the stock pens into which the stock is unloaded and does not hire or control the men who do the unloading; and whether the Union Stock Yards, at Chicago, have been, in railroad phraseology or in legal definition, the depot of defendants is immaterial, for they were and still are, in fact, the point to which the stock is transported and unloaded under the shipping contract of defendants.

Excluding the territory covered by the reduction of 1896, which is described in the findings of the Commission, live-stock rates to Chicago, participated in by by the defendant carriers, were, on May 31, 1894, reasonable compensation for the service performed, including delivery at the Union Stock Yards, in Chicago. At all times since that date such rates have been and now are sufficiently high to include a delivery at the stock yards as such delivery was made prior to June 1, 1894. While since that time there have been advances and reductions, they have been about equal, averaging probably less than 1 cent per 100 pounds, and the great majority of rates remain the same as they were on May 31, 1894. These scattered reductions, as well as the advances, applied variously, some on cattle, some on sheep, and others on hogs.

No change in the rate has been made to offset the addition of the terminal charge in Chicago of $2 per car or with any reference to such charge. The imposition of any such terminal charge, except in so far as the cost in Chicago of delivery has been increased by the trackage charge paid by defendants to the stock-yards company, since June 1, 1894, is unreasonable. Such increased cost of delivery—that is to say, such trackage charge—is fairly estimated for all the defendants at $1 per car. Thereupon the Commission held, first, that delivery to the Union Stock Yards prior to June 1, 1894, was included in the rate and was in no sense a gratuity; second, that outside of the excluded territory the terminal charge for delivery to the stock yards in Chicago of $1 per car is reasonable, and that defendants' terminal charge of $2 per car, exacted since June 1, 1894, is unreasonable.

As before stated, the case was retained for further proceedings in the matter of reparation.

Mr. Speaker, the questions asked by my resolution are designed to secure information (now in the possession of the Interstate Commerce Commission) that will, in my judgment, show conclusively that the State of Texas has been unjustly discriminated against not only in live-stock rates, but in all classes of freight. This matter is of so great importance to my State that the last legislature passed the following resolution, viz:

[From General Laws of Texas, 1905.]

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION—RELATIVE TO CONGRESS GRANTING IT MORE POWER.

House concurrent resolution No. 9.

Whereas Texas is a long distance from the manufacturing and market centers of the United States, and the high interstate rates now being charged to Texas common points make an amendment of the interstate-commerce law, increasing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so as to enable said Commission to ascertain and enforce reasonable freight rates, one of deep concern to our people: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we indorse the action of our Members of Congress in voting for a bill to increase the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we invoke the assistance of our Senators in securing the passage of such needed legislation through the Senate of the United States. We also commend the splendid presentation of the necessity for granting more power to the Interstate Commerce Commission made by a distinguished citizen of Texas, the Hon. Sam Cowan, of Fort Worth. And we express our gratification and approval of the firm and courageous course of the President of the United States in respect to this most important question.

Approved February 21, 1905.

I think this information, now being in their possession, should be sent to Congress for its information and guidance, inasmuch as we are to take up, I understand, this freight-rate question in a very few days.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce if it has been considered by his committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. It has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think it ought to be?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it would be better to have it considered by that committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I think, Mr. Speaker, it had better go there and give that committee opportunity to consider it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I submit the question as to whether or not this is a privileged resolution under the rules. I therefore move to discharge the committee and consider it in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it does not come within the class of resolutions which are privileged, as this does not call upon the head of a Department. And there are precedents which show that this resolution is not privileged, and it seems to the Chair that under the rule it is not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, do I understand the Chair to hold that no resolution of inquiry can be directed to anyone except it be to the head of a Department himself, or to the President?

The SPEAKER. "Resolutions of inquiry," the Chair will read from the Digest, "addressed to the heads of Executive Departments only are privileged, and then not until reported or one week from presentation."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, I would ask the Speaker if this Interstate Commerce Commission is not the head of a Department?

The SPEAKER. The precedent is based upon a resolution where the call was upon the head of the Smithsonian Institution. It seems to the Chair that it is on all fours with the present case, and that the rule is explicit in itself that it applies to the head of an Executive Department.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand the difference to be this, Mr. Speaker, that this Interstate Commerce Commission has control of freight rates.

The SPEAKER. And still it is not an Executive Department.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is semijudicial, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Well, it would be quite competent for the House to adopt a rule that would make the resolution privileged, but it has not done so, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does it not belong to any Executive Department then?

The SPEAKER. It is similar to the resolution calling upon the head of the Smithsonian Institution for information, in that respect.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then can no inquiry be directed to the Smithsonian Institution?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; but the gentleman and the Chair are engaged in a conversation as to the meaning of the rule, as to whether a resolution could be framed, directed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that would be privileged under the rule. The House has power to inquire about anything.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will withdraw his objection and let this be considered.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had better consider the question. If reported here by them, I would not have any objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives, for its information, all the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which shows or tends to show that there exists at this time, or heretofore within the last twelve months has existed, a combination or arrangement between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, the Northern Central Railway Company, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, or any two or more of said railroad companies, in violation of the act passed July 2, 1890, and entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reserve the right to object and to inquire whether this resolution has been reported.

The SPEAKER. This resolution was introduced January 18, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed. The gentleman now, as a matter of privilege under the rules, moves to discharge the committee from further consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution is privileged under that statement, and I would suggest to the gentleman to insert the usual words requesting information from the President. After the word "requested" insert "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. GILLESPIE. I will accept that amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House. The motion is to discharge the committee. If that is done, the resolution will be subject to amendment.

The question was taken; and the committee was discharged from further consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Now the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I accept the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, after the word "requested," insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, just a word. Does the gentleman think this resolution in proper form, to request the President to send this information? Ought it not to be addressed to the Department from which the information is desired?

Mr. GILLESPIE. As I understand, that is not an Executive Department, and the President can get that information through the Interstate Commerce Commission as the head of all Departments of the Government.

Mr. DALZELL. I am asking for information.

Mr. GILLESPIE. That is the distinct idea upon which the resolution is framed.

Mr. DALZELL. Is that right?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I desire to state that under the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor the President can make public such information as he approves. The President shall in his discretion make public any information received from that Department as he may deem proper.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is in error about that. That is a provision with reference to investigations by the Bureau of Corporations in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. The President gets this information from the Interstate Commerce Commission and gives the House the benefit of it.

Mr. DALZELL. Why should not this information be got through the Commission?

Mr. BURLESON. Because it is not one of the Departments.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, if this resolution requiring information from the Interstate Commerce Commission primarily would not be privileged, then it can not be made privileged by addressing it to the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the resolution has been agreed to, and still the gentleman can move to reconsider, and the Chair regards all that is now being said as by unanimous consent. Rule XXII is as follows:

All resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments shall be reported to the House within one week after presentation.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, the President is not the head of a Department within the meaning of that rule. But, in the second place, if that information ought to be had by reason of an inquiry addressed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is sought to evade the rule because that is not an Executive Department, then this resolution can not be made privileged by addressing it to the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that he ought to rule on a subject not before the House, but if before the House the Chair would be prepared to rule; and perhaps by unanimous consent the Chair may be indulged in an informal expression of opinion, which he might not possibly be bound by, as to whether the President is the head of the Executive Departments. Now, it seems to the Chair, under a fair construction of this rule, that the President is the head not only of one, but all the Executive Departments. The Chair only intimates what he would hold as at present advised if the question were before the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. That resolution and the preceding one were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. I ask for order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEPBURN. Neither of these resolutions have been considered by the committee. It has been engaged upon public matters, I might say, perhaps, of superior importance, and the chairman of that committee did not regard the matter as important—that is, in the sense of hurried action on the question. I do not think that Rule XXII can anywhere be invoked in relation to that. One calls for information from the President of the United States, the other for information from the Interstate Commerce Commission. Rule XXII makes special certain resolutions, under certain circumstances, that call for information from the head of a Department. The chairman of that committee did not consider that these two resolutions, or either of them, were affected by that rule. I say that in justification of the nonaction of that committee.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that resolution may be reported again.

The SPEAKER. All this proceeds by unanimous consent, and without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

The Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. OLMSTED. If I may be permitted a moment to call attention to an act of Congress defining what is an Executive Department and what is the head of an Executive Department——

Mr. GILLESPIE. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire if the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted on the right side so that under the rule he is entitled to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. There was no record of the vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the resolution has not been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that it was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker put the question as to whether the committee should be discharged, and said that the resolution would then be before the House for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the notes of the Official Reporter in a moment.

Mr. GILLESPIE. The resolution has been agreed to, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under that impression. The Chair has sent for the reporter's notes of what was done and will have them in a moment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a very unanimous expression of opinion in this part of the House that what the Speaker did was to submit the amendment, and the amendment was agreed to, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] addressed the Speaker as to whether it was a privileged resolution or not.

The SPEAKER. One moment and we will have the reporter's notes and there will be no doubt whatever about it.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I have no desire to cut off discussion as to the merits of the resolution if, by unanimous consent, the House wishes to indulge in such a discussion. I do not wish to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it well to find out "where we are at."

Mr. DALZELL. I want to say that the motion I now make is wholly irrespective of the merits. I think it is a very important principle as to whether you can make resolutions privileged which are not otherwise privileged by addressing them to the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is correct. The resolution has been agreed to. The notes of the Official Reporter show that to be the fact.

Mr. DALZELL. Then I move to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to reconsider the vote.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] moves to lay that motion on the table.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DALZELL. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 98.

Mr. GILLESPIE. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk began to call the roll.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, none of us knows what this vote is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will, by unanimous consent, state that the resolution was agreed to and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] moved to reconsider, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] moved to lay that motion upon the table. Upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the House is now voting.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that there are very few Members who are acquainted with the resolution.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. That is the misfortune of gentlemen. The regular order is demanded. The resolution is at the desk.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 92, answered "present" 7, not voting 163, as follows:

The name of Mr. CRUMPACKER was called, and he answered "present," as above recorded.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if Mr. LONGWORTH has voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to withdraw my vote in the affirmative and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. ALLEN of New Jersey. I came into the room on the second call just as my name was called by the Clerk. I did not have time to answer before the next name was called.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I notice that I am paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. BROUSSARD. I was paired with him during Friday and Saturday only. There is no authority whatever to pair me for to-day.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, may be made the special order for to-morrow and continuing days until the final action of the House upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill—be made the special order for to-morrow and continuing from day to day until completed. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman whether there has been a sufficient print of that bill for Members to procure copies. I have been unable to get any.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not, and I intend later to ask for an additional print.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that the gentleman in asking for that additional print provide that a certain number go to each Member of the House, because as soon as they get into the room they are gobbled up by a few people and Members who are really interested in the bill have no way of obtaining copies.

Mr. HEPBURN. I shall ask that they be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. BARTLETT. I don't know how many of the reports have been printed, but it might be well to have the reports distributed in the same way.

Mr. HEPBURN. I intend to include that in the same request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the request of the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12987, the railroad rate bill, beginning with to-morrow, be made a special order for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and from day to day thereafter until consideration of the bill is concluded. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I trust that request will be granted. We have both sides, the majority and the minority, agreeing upon this very important measure, and upon it full debate will be given. I trust that no objection will be made by anybody.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. ADAMSON, and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unaniomus consent that the time for general debate of this measure be equally divided, to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. ADAMSON, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the report, which contains the bill, be printed for the use of the House, to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that he also have 5,000 copies of the bill printed, which will be in bill form. It is true that the bill is in the report, but it is in fine print.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask that that also be included in the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the bill and of the report be printed and distributed through the folding room. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1258) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Paige, alias Jackson Morse, and the same referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REPRINT OF BILLS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. BATES, leave was granted for a reprint of the bill (H. At the request of Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 254) declaring all persons or associations of persons, joint stock companies, corporations, or associations of such companies or corporations, owning or operating or owning and operating private freight cars and refrigerator cars used in interstate commerce to be common carriers and subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule to-day, Monday, is set aside for the consideration of bills relating to the District of Columbia, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MORRELL.

RETENTS ON CONTRACTS WITH THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], who is ill and unable therefore to be here, I call up first the bill (H. R. 125) regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on all contracts made by the District of Columbia for construction work there shall be held a retent of 10 per cent of the cost of such construction work as a guaranty fund to keep the work done under such contracts in repair, and that the terms of such contracts shall be strictly and faithfully performed. On contracts for the construction of asphalt, tar, brick, cement, or stone pavements the retent shall be held for a term of five years from the date of completion of the contract. On contracts for the construction of bridges and sewers the retent shall be held for a term of one year from the date of completion of the contract. On contracts for the construction of buildings, and other contracts for construction work, the retent shall be held until the completion of the work. All retents for one year or more shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as now required by law.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of this bill I will say that the present law of the District government compels a retent of 10 per cent for five years on all contracts for public works, except on building and grading. This works a great hardship upon small contractors, particularly if they have any number of different contracts with the Government, for the reason that it locks up a great deal of their capital, and the object of this bill is to reduce that amount.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMENDING DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 120.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 120) to amend section 7 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"Any justice of the peace may, on complaint under oath or actual view, issue warrants returnable to the police court against persons accused of crimes and offenses committed in the District of Columbia, and he shall make a record of his proceedings in every case in a book to be kept for that purpose: Provided, That such warrants shall be issued to all persons applying therefor at all times, including Sundays and legal holidays, upon demand, free of charge."

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine."

In line 5 insert after the word "may" the words "at any time, including Sundays and legal holidays."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 9 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia."

On motion of Mr. MORRELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SEC. 3. That it shall also be the duty of the owner, lessee, occupant, or person having possession, charge, or control of any building used or intended to be used as set forth in section 1 of this act, or any building in which ten or more persons are employed, as set forth in section 2 of this act, to provide, install, and maintain therein proper and sufficient guide signs, guide lights, exit lights, hall and stairway lights, fire hose, and fire extinguishers, in such location and numbers and of such type and character as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine.

Each elevator shaft and stairway extending to the basement of such buildings shall terminate in a fireproof compartment or inclosure, separating the elevator shaft and stairs from other parts of the basement, and no opening shall be made or maintained in such compartment or inclosure unless the same be provided with self-closing fireproof doors.

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful to obstruct any hall, passageway, corridor, or stairway in any building mentioned in this act with baggage, trunks, furniture, cans, or with any other thing whatsoever.

SEC. 7. That no door or window leading to any fire escape shall be covered or obstructed by any fixed grating or barrier, and no person shall at any time place any incumbrance or obstacle upon any fire escape or upon any platform, ladder, or stairway leading to or from any fire escape.

SEC. 8. That no license shall be issued to any person to conduct any business for which a license is required in any building mentioned in this act until such building has been provided and equipped with a sufficient number of fire escapes and other appliances required by this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC HAY SCALES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 4469.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4469) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make regulations respecting the public hay scales.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make such regulations as they may deem proper for the sale of the use of the public hay scales of the District of Columbia, and to place public weighmasters in charge of such scales when deemed necessary and to prescribe the fees to be paid by the persons using such scales to the said weighmasters for services rendered by them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether this is reported from the committee?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes, sir; and if the gentleman desires any information on the subject I will request the gentleman who made the report [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas] to give it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. MORRELL. It was reported unanimously; yes. It is a bill that was recommended by the Commissioners. They sent a letter in favor of it, and it was reported favorably by the committee unanimously.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that these scales belong to the District of Columbia, do they not?

Mr. MORRELL. These are District scales.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable the Commissioners to avoid what they think has been a combination of those who have bid for the use of these scales. The Commissioners regard it as a valuable privilege, and they want to avoid the combination that keeps down the price at public auctions at which the weighing privilege is sold under an old law. They want, in the event that the privilege of these scales is not sold for sufficient, to put a man in charge on their own account.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does that prohibit the use of private scales—that is, dealers doing their own weighing?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are other regulations governing that matter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it might inconvenience them to have to go to a distant part of the city?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is to protect the public against false weights and measures.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would they not get that more directly to have some one supervise the weights and scales?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Such supervision is now provided for in the law to which this is amendatory. The purpose of this amendment is to protect the Commissioners against the combination of those who have charge of these scales. The weighing privilege is sold at auction annually, and the Commissioners think it a valuable privilege and that it has been bringing too small an amount. Now they want, in case the amount bid is not in their opinion sufficient, to put a man in charge of the scales on their own account and collect the usual fees that are charged. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read a third time, and passed.

NAMES OF STREETS.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 7048.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] desires to call up bill H. R. 7048, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7048) changing names of Pierce place, Blake street, Swann street, Cedar street or place, and Oregon avenue, to Samson street.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the street passing through squares Nos. 206, 191, 177, 152, and 132, lying between S and T streets, Fourteenth and Nineteenth streets, in the District of Columbia, now known by the various names of Pierce place, Blake street, Swann street, Cedar street or place, and Oregon avenue, shall hereafter be known and designated throughout its entire length as "Samson street," in honor of the late George Whitefield Samson, president of the Columbian College (now the George Washington University), Washington, D. C., from 1859 to 1871.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I understand that this provides one name in the place of many?

Mr. MORRELL. One name to the street the entire length.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the bill, and I would like to be recognized in my own time, if possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has one hour, and he can yield such portion of it as he chooses.

Mr. MORRELL. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it will take much time, but I would prefer that those in favor of the bill would first present their reasons why they want it passed. Perhaps no one wants it passed.

Mr. MORRELL. In view of the request, I will call upon the gentleman who made the report on the bill, Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I will yield to the gentleman such time as he desires or will give him the balance of my time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion before this is begun, and that is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall yield the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] half of his time, so he can distribute it as he pleases. Of course he need not do so unless he desires.

Mr. MORRELL. I think that is but fair, Mr. Speaker. I will yield to the gentleman one-half of my time.

The SPEAKER. One-half of the hour?

Mr. MORRELL. One-half of the hour.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it will take even half of that.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill has been fully set forth. The street at present has five names, some of which are duplicated in other parts of the city of Washington and once or twice in Georgetown. The old street named after this distinguished gentleman was changed, and at that time it was tactily understood by the District Committee that another street should bear the name of Samson. This street which it is proposed to call Samson street comes in alphabetically with the arrangement in the District—that is, being between S and T. At present Oregon avenue is not in harmony with that. Doctor Samson was the president of the Columbian University for a series of years. He was a distinguished man; a man worthy to have a street named after him. I have his record here, and if any gentleman is interested I will read it, but if not asked to do so, I will not read it. The report on this street is favored by the District Commissioners; it also passed the District Committee of the House. The gentleman from Tennessee was not there at the time. I will say probably he would have opposed it had he been there. For these reasons I hope that the motion will prevail.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Is it not the practice to reserve the names of States for avenues that run obliquely through the city?

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. I understand it is.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think I can explain in a very few moments my objection to the bill. We are asked here to change the names of Pierce place, Blake street, Swan street, Cedar street or place, and Oregon avenue all to Samson street. This is a question that interests all the people of the District of Columbia. The people who live on these streets have their post-office addresses upon them, and they are well known. We are asked to change the names of all these streets to the name of Samson street. And for what purpose? It is not to commemorate the name of Admiral Sampson, but George Whitefield Samson, who was president of the Columbian College, now George Washington University, Washington, D. C., from 1859 to 1871.

Now, the whole object and purpose of changing the names of these streets is that the name of this deceased professor of Columbian College may have his name given to some street in Washington City. Even the college itself lost its name. It is shown by the bill itself it is now George Washington University. A young gentleman named Samson, grandson of this professor, has been besieging the District Committee for four or five years to get some street named after his grandfather in this city. Three or four years ago we considered the matter in a bill pending then before the House and finally changed the name to Church street. Now, here is even Oregon avenue, the name of a State, to be wiped out in order to have that street named Samson street. You see how this will work. If we let this thing go through, every school-teacher in Washington may be besieging this House in order to have his name given to a street.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the policy pursued in the city of Washington has been a correct one, namely, that the great avenues should be given the names of States and the streets named after great national characters in all cases where the letters of the alphabet are not used. The avenues are named after the States and the squares and circles after great national characters. If it was a new street and had no name, it then would have been a different matter. This nation has no end of great national characters and we are making them every day; and now it is moved to strike out five names and put in the name of Samson, a private individual, against whom I have no fault, nor have I against the grandson endeavoring to get his grandfather's name given to the street. But the idea of Congress getting down to this kind of business is something I can not agree to. Why, I have not heard of a single individual who has lived on these streets that has asked for this change to be made. There has not been any hearing before the committee. I have not heard a word said by anybody, except this young man, and I do not condemn him for endeavoring to get the name of the street given to his deceased ancestor.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Tennessee said there had been no hearings in this matter. I will ask the gentleman if he does not recall that this very question took up almost the entire time of the committee during a session in the last Congress?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I was speaking of this bill. I do not remember whether that bill embraced these same streets or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think they are exactly the same streets.

Mr. SIMS. But I will ask the gentleman about these hearings, if he will say whether it was the people who lived along these streets that wanted the change of the names made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will not take up the gentleman's time. I will answer that in my own time. I will say, however, there were many there interested in the change of the names of the street other than the young gentleman to whom the gentleman has referred.

Mr. SIMS. Were they people who lived on these streets who will be affected, or were they merely friends of this young man?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, my recollection is not very distinct, but I think there were many who said they were interested in having a uniformity of names for the avenues and streets.

Mr. SIMS. Did they ask for this particular name, Samson?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think they were not urging any one particular name.

Mr. SIMS. Why, one of the names is Oregon avenue. That is named after one of the great States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For the reason, if the gentleman please, that avenues take the names of States, while streets have not been so named in this city.

Mr. SIMS. One of the streets to be changed and to lose its name is Oregon avenue,

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oregon avenue for the distance of one block, between Seventeenth and Eighteenth.

Mr. SIMS. If you are going to change these names, why not extend Oregon avenue to cover all these?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Under the plat of this city this is not an avenue and could not be. It is a street. That is to say, avenues run diagonally, while the streets run north and south and east and west.

Mr. SIMS. One of the names to be changed by this bill is Oregon avenue, to be changed to Samson street. Now, if it is necessary to name all these streets by one name, I would still insist that it should be some great national character, and we have so many of them that are not commemorated on the map of Washington.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman speaks of naming five or six streets. Is it not in reality one continuous street with five or six names?

Mr. SIMS. That is correct, as I understand it, and if it is desired that all these streets under different names should have one name, as they are connected, I still fail to see why we should name the street Samson street, or why we should give it the name of any other private individual, when the nation's history is full of the names of great historical characters who are not on the plat of the city of Washington. If any gentleman wants to amend this bill and put the name of some national character into it, I shall not have any objection to that; but how many more school professors or the relatives of deceased professors will come here and ask to have streets named after them? Why, I suppose it will not be very long—and it will be a very strong name to conjure with—before somebody will want a street named for Mr. Harry St. George Tucker, because he has been one of the presidents of this institution. It would be a splendid name, of a splendid man; but are we going to set the precedent of wiping out the names we have and adopting the names of deceased private citizens, however virtuous or learned they may have been? We have a number of educational institutions here.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Would the gentleman be willing to substitute the name of Schley instead of Samson?

Mr. SIMS. If this was to be "Sampson," in commemoration of the great admiral; but the bill itself says "George Whitfield Samson," a former president of the college. If the change suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be carried out it would be a very meritorious amendment. I should much prefer to have it named after Admiral Sampson, because he was a great national character. I would not object to its being Schley street, because he is a great national character. I should not object to a street being named after any well-known national character. Why, Mr. Speaker, the day may come when we will want to name a street "Olmsted street," and what would we do if the space is all taken. [Laughter.] I think I would be in favor of that.

Mr. OLMSTED. Why not begin right now? [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. Would you be willing to have this named Sims street?

Mr. SIMS. I should object to that, Mr. Speaker, for the reason I have given, that I think the streets of this city ought to be named after great national characters. Why, the day may come when we will want some street called Cannon street, or Payne street, or Dalzell street, or Williams street, and we are going to take up all the space in naming the streets after private individuals, who, however good and virtuous they were, are unknown to the people of the United States generally. I think we are going a great way to change the names of existing streets and adopt new names for no better reason than has been given to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MORRELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], I think, has been a little misled in regard to Mr. Samson. Possibly he has been misled by the name, for he seems to have the gait of a gazer. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks rather deprecatingly about Mr. Samson as a school-teacher. Some of the Presidents of the United States have been school-teachers, and I consider it an honored profession. The gentleman says there have been no papers from people living on the street. I hold in my hand a few letters, one of them from J. W. Chapman, who says that he is the largest owner on Pierce place and Blake street, and he favors giving a uniform name to the street; also from three other property holders on the same street, and they all favor this change of name. This proposed name begins with S, and as it is between S and T streets it is therefore alphabetically correct and is in conformity with the arrangements for street naming adopted by the Commissioners. The gentleman for whom we propose to name this street is distinguished enough to make the proposed name a worthy honor. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. MORRELL. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I shall not ask the attention of the House for that length of time. The purpose of changing the name of these streets is not to honor Mr. Samson, but to give uniformity to the name of the street. As has already been stated, for a distance of five blocks this street has five separate and distinct names. Some of these names are the same as those of other streets and alleys within the city. Here are a few of the duplicates that occur: Pierce place, between Fourteenth and Sixteenth streets NW.; Pierce street, Anacostia; Pierce street NW., from North Capitol to New Jersey avenue; Pierce Mill road, Rock Creek; Pierce street, alley, from L to Pierce street; Swann street, between Sixteenth and Seventeenth NW.; Swan alley NW.; Cedar alley, from 1325 S to 1322 P; Cedar court SW., from 19 E street; Cedar road, from Spring street road; Cedar street NW., from 1836 Thirteenth street and from Eighteenth street above S.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hearings we had in the Fifty-eighth Congress, as I remember it, disclosed the fact that all the people wanted uniformity. Some wanted Samson street, some wanted the entire street changed to Pierce, and some the name of a distinguished President given to the entire length. Some suggested other names, but all were united in demanding that there be uniformity in the name of the street. The suggestion was made by the gentleman from Tennessee a moment ago that this street already contains the name of an avenue given to it for the State of Oregon. Now, that would be contrary to the purpose that was had when this city was laid out. The avenues run diagonally across the city. Oregon avenue is just one block in length, running between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets, and to give "Oregon" as the name of this street covering but five blocks affected by this bill would not be in harmony with the policy that has heretofore been pursued with regard to the naming of the avenues after States.

So that the name of Samson or any other name that may be substituted, other than Oregon, should be applied to this street.

The committee has no pride in the matter so far as the name is concerned. Any suitable name that will give uniformity is all that the committee asks. But they do ask that action be had and that uniformity be given to these five blocks by giving it one name.

Mr. PALMER. Would it not be belittling to the State of Oregon to give that name to this short street only five blocks in length?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think it would. I do not think it would be fair to the State of Oregon to give it a name of a street only five blocks in length.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit of an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Does this street run through New Hampshire avenue?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think it does. It runs between S and T from Fourteenth to Nineteenth street NW.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not want to interfere with the committee, but if they are looking for a name, the house in which Admiral Sampson died is on the corner of that street and New Hampshire avenue.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is not the same name. I will say to the gentleman from New York that at the time of the hearings the name of Admiral Sampson was suggested.

Mr. PERKINS. The house in which Admiral Sampson lived and died is on the corner of this street and New Hampshire avenue.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask if the committee would not accept an amendment to call this "Sampson place," spelling it with a "p."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no pride in the matter, but the gentleman who reported the bill favors the name of "Samson," and that is the name that was agreed upon by the committee, not because of any particular desire to avoid any other name, but this name seems to have been presented with more force and argument to the committee. The distinguished gentleman whose name is to be perpetuated by this bill was at one time the president of a great university here for many years and was one of the substantial citizens of the city of Washington, a public-spirited philanthropist, a great educator, and a man of high piety. He left an honored name, and many spoke highly of him before the committee other than his great grandson, who takes just pride in his memory.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-three minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the time which the gentleman from Tennessee has courteously yielded to me I desire to have read this amendment, which at the proper time I shall offer and press, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11 strike out the word "Samson" and insert the word "Wheeler."

Strike out all after the word "late," in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof "Gen. Joseph Wheeler;" so that it will read: "Wheeler street, in honor of the late Gen. Joseph Wheeler."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a custom in this House, which has been varied but once within my recollection or experience, to take no action when there occurs the death of a gentleman, no matter how distinguished, who had served in this House at some prior time. It seems to me that we could not, with safety, pursue any other course in a body of such large proportions as this, and one so frequently changing, but it seems to me, also, that it is eminently fitting, when the opportunity is presented, to take such action as will indicate our knowledge of the passing away of an unusual character. General Wheeler for more than a decade served in this House, I might say, with unparalleled industry, certainly with very great ability and with wonderful vitality and unchanging courtesy toward all. In the prime of his vigorous manhood he fought with bravery and brilliancy for the cause which he believed to be right. With the shadow of life's evening over him he battled for our common flag with a zeal and an energy which belied his years. At this moment in another part of this city are being held the funeral services over his remains, and it seems to me that here in this body, in which are still serving many, many men who saw his service here, who associated with him and know from experience his fidelity and his worth, it is but fitting that in this meager way we pay such tribute as we can to the memory of one of the greatest of generals, Joseph Wheeler. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this House could not add renown or fame to the name of Gen. Joseph Wheeler today by giving his name to a little street consisting of but five short blocks in length in this city. His name needs no such trifling tribute at the hands of the House of Represetnatives. The name of Gen. Joseph Wheeler will live and pass on through the ages without being mentioned in connection with a street five blocks in length in the city of Washington. Indeed, he needs no such monument. Why, sir, he needs neither marble nor bronze to perpetuate his fame and memory, much less this action. The adoption of this amendment could not add to his immortality in history. On the contrary, it would not be in keeping with the solemnity of his burial at this moment to drop such a trifling tribute upon his grave.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the District Committee I have for some time been impressed with the fact that the present system of street extension in the District of Columbia is unequal and incongruous. Long before the discussion of January 8, 1906, over the Kalorama avenue bill was precipitated upon the House I had begun an investigation not only of the system of the District, but of systems of other cities of the United States. The motive which led me to do this was that I might present a bill for a general law which would remedy these incongruities and inequalities.

I now desire to present, as comprehensively as possible, the weaknesses of the present system and to outline the principles upon which a general bill should be drawn.

The Washington system of street extension rests upon four distinct bodies of law. These are:

1. The general highway act of 1893.
2. A series of special street-extension acts.
3. The Code of the District of Columbia.
4. Provisions of general appropriation bills.

I. The general highway act of 1893 is a very elaborate law. It provides that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prepare a plan for the extension of a permanent system of highways over all that portion of said district not included within the limits of the city of Washington and Georgetown. It requires that this system shall conform to the street plan of the city of Washington as nearly as practicable; that the streets shall not be less than 90 feet in width nor more than 160 feet; that the Commissioners shall map out each and every street extension area planned by themselves and submit this for approval to a commission, consisting of—at the time—the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Chief of Engineers; when approved, this map shall become the plan for the boundaries and dimensions of all the streets, avenues, and roads in the said area; that they shall then proceed to condemn the land needed for such streets, avenues, and roads, and which may not have been dedicated by the owners thereof, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia sitting as a district court of the United States; that a jury of SEVEN SHALL, under the direction of this court, ascertain the damages occasioned by each extension, assess one-half of these against the land benefited and one-half against the revenues of the District of Columbia. It provides for an appeal from the decision of this court sitting as a district court to the same court in general term.

The jury under this act is specifically required to assess the damages caused by the opening of any highway against other property which it shall ascertain and determine to have been benefited to a proportional part of the whole of said one-half of the damages. In general terms this law may be said to be a good law, and had it been rigidly adhered to by Congress its effects would have been beneficial. On account, however, of the appeal provision which it contains, vigorous objections were urged against it by interested parties, and out of this grew a flourishing body of special laws passed by the Congress of the United States.

II. Very soon after the passage of the general highway act, Congress was importuned to pass special acts for the opening of certain streets, and entered upon a career of street legislation which has produced something more than twenty special acts. After four or five years of experiment with this species of legislation, an effort was made to arrange a form which should become a model for all succeeding bills, and which we have been told in this discussion did become a model. In fact, it has, I believe, been stated upon this floor, that this particular bill follows this prearranged form word for word. The difficulty is to ascertain which of these numerous special acts was the model. As I shall show, they are all alike except in the ten or eleven sections which define the court machinery and the modus operandi by which the decisions of the court are carried into effect. They differ in almost every material provision which makes for or against what might be considered wise legislation. Some of the bills require a dedication of from two-thirds to three-fourths of the land required as an antecedent condition; one bill requires the payment of a money consideration as collateral before proceedings shall begin; all the others require neither a dedication of land nor a payment of money.

But the main question, Who shall pay for these improvements? is answered by these acts in an absurdly contradictory manner. Some of them require that all the damages ascertained to be due shall be assessed against other land benefited; in other cases only 50 per cent of the damages is to be so assessed; and in others a discretion is given to the Commissioners by which an amount less than 50 per cent may be assessed.

In arranging for the deferred assessments some of these acts give two equal annual assessments and charge 10 per cent annual interest thereon; others give five years at 4 per cent annual interest, and still others four years at 5 per cent annual interest.

All of these special acts apply to one particular part of the city and ignore all other parts. They all, up to the present, have applied to that region lying between Tennallytown road and the Soldiers' Home, north of Rock Creek, or in the neighborhood of the National Park. It may be remarked that this region is the one in which the speculative interests have predominated since 1888.

I have investigated the thirteen special acts passed by the Fifty-eighth Congress in order that I might show the differences which I have just pointed out. These acts are:

1. The Wrights road act of April 22, 1904, which requires that the entire amount of damages shall be assessed against the lands benefited in two equal annual installments, with interest at 10 per cent per annum.

2. The act for the extension of Twenty-third street from S to California, April 22, 1904, followed the preceding act in every particular, but required the jury to include the expenses of the condemnation proceedings in the damages. The deferred assessments were five, carrying interest at 4 per cent.

3. The Kalorama avenue act, April 28, 1904, did not require the assessment of all the damages, nor even 50 per cent, against lands benefited, but gave the Commissioners discretion to accept a less percentage.

4. The Euclid avenue act, April 28, 1904, followed the preceding.

5. The V street act, April 28, 1904, required the parties interested to deposit $1,250 as an antecedent condition. It assessed the entire damage against the benefits and provided for five assessments at 4 per cent.

6. The act opening highways on the east and west sides of the Zoological Park, April 28, 1904, followed the Kalorama avenue act of the same date.

7. The Albemarle street extension act, April 28, 1904, is in the same form.

8. The Wyoming avenue act, April 28, 1904, required all the damages to be assessed as benefits.

9. The T street extension, March 3, 1905, assessed 50 per cent or less of the damages against beneficiaries.

10. The M street extension act, March 3, 1905, required a dedication of at least two-thirds of the land needed for the extension; assessed all the damages against benefits, but exempted the remaining parts of all the lands owned by the dedicants from assessment. The assessments were two, at 10 per cent per annum.

11. The Nineteenth street extension act, March 3, 1905, assessed the entire damages against the benefits and made two assessments at 10 per cent.

12. The Kalorama extension act, March 3, 1905, assessed the entire damages against the benefits and made five assessments at 4 per cent.

13. The Rittenhouse street extension act, March 3, 1905, required a dedication of at least two-thirds of the land, assessed the entire amount of damages against benefits, exempted dedicants from further assessment, and made two equal annual assessments at 10 per cent.

In the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress the Sixteenth street extension act was passed. This required a dedication of three-fourths of all the land and that 50 per cent of the damages should be assessed against abutters, but not against the dedicants. These dedicants gave about 50 acres of agricultural land as the price for the enormous exemption which they received in the act referred to. It is a strange commentary upon this character of legislation, that if the act requires an assessment of all the damages against benefits the jury apparently has no trouble in finding a full 100 per cent of beneficiaries, and if the act requires 50 per cent the jury apparently finds this with equal ease. In other words, a jury seems to have no difficulty in finding whatever percentage of benefits may be demanded by the act in the property abutting, adjacent, or contiguous to the improvement. But in the Sixteenth street extension the jury broke down. Although required to find but 50 per cent of benefited property after exempting the dedicants, it could find but about 13 per cent of beneficiaries.

The damages assessed by the jury were $729,952.

The benefits were $108,834.

Although the act required that 50 per cent of the damages should be assessed against beneficiaries, under the discretionary power given the Commissioners this finding was approved and this balance, $620,018, was cast one-half on the abutters who were not dedicants and one-half upon the District of Columbia.

It must be remembered—and this is most important—that, in addition to the damages set out, the entire cost of grading and paving roadways is borne by the taxpayers at large, and that but only one-half the cost of sidewalks is assessed on abutting property owners, the other half being borne by the public.

I want it distinctly understood that I do not find fault with the dedicants for taking advantage of existing laws regarding dedicants, nor do I find fault with those who bought and own the property through which these streets have been opened, but I do most emphatically find fault with and condemn the laws themselves and this character of legislation.

III. The third body of underlying law in the matter of street opening is the Code of the District of Columbia. On February 23, 1905, an act amending the Code of the District of Columbia was passed, which enacted a general law as to alleys and minor streets. It empowered the Commissioners to open, extend, widen, or straighten alleys or minor streets upon petition of more than half of the owners of real estate in the square or block, and limited the width of the minor street to not less than 40 nor more than 60 feet; it authorized condemnations by a jury of five persons, to be selected and charged as in the preceding acts; it authorized all damages to be assessed as benefits and made four deferred payments or assessments carrying 4 per cent.

One great difficulty in the opening of new streets under the Washington system is the modus operandi of the initial proceedings. Too much has been left in the initiative to interested parties and too little to the owners of the real estate of the District to be improved. There is a system very much in favor among American cities very much like the provision set out in the Code. That provision is the one which authorizes the creation of separate street-improvement districts. These districts are to be found throughout the American Union and have contributed no little to the solution of the vexed question of street opening and the original or first cost of street improvement.

The citizens of the District of Columbia, and by this I mean those whose residence is here and not elsewhere, are deprived of the right of suffrage. To give them the right to form special improvement districts, either in the old city or in the outlying suburbs, would, in my opinion, not only add to their privileges as citizens, but would contribute largely to the improvement of the streets of the District. The provision of the Code limits the street improvement, based upon the petition of more than half the owners of real estate, to a square or block and to minor streets. It should be enlarged to permit a majority of the real estate owners along any street or system of streets to so petition and to form a special improvement district, the entire expense of which shall be cast upon the property of that district and assessed at not more than 2 per cent per annum until full payment is made. This system has worked well elsewhere, because it to a large measure places these improvements directly in the hands of the property owners themselves, and as they pay the bills and improve in harmony with plans furnished by the Commissioners of the District there should be no objection to its enactment here.

IV. The Government of the United States, in the sundry civil appropriation bills of March 3, 1899, and June 6, 1900, made a direct appropriation to the Adams Mill road extension. Although this method is rarely used, this appropriation shows that streets may be improved by a direct appropriation from the United States Treasury.

COMPARISON OF THE WASHINGTON CITY SYSTEM WITH OTHER CITY SYSTEMS.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious, I think, that the fault of the Washington system is not so much in method as in law. There is too much law. There are too many ways of reaching an end under the law, and the most vicious of these is the one which permits the opening and improvement of streets by special acts of Congress. Other American cities operate under a single well-known law passed by the legislatures of the respective States, while Washington operates under a series of four distinct bodies of law, in which the body known as special acts differs materially and overrides the other bodies of the law. The laws under which the cities operate are rarely changed, while the laws of the District of Columbia are changed frequently, sixteen having been passed since 1902.

All of the cities of the State of New York, whether of the first, second, or third classes, are by general statutes authorized to condemn lands for the opening of streets, but the expense must be borne wholly by the property benefited, except that the council of any city, whenever an improvement shall be deemed more general than local, may assess a part of the expense against the city.

All the cities of the State of Ohio are authorized by general statutes to assess upon abutting, adjacent, contiguous, or other specially benefited lots or lands in the corporation, any part of the entire cost and expense connected with the improvement. The municipality, however, must pay at least 2 per cent and may pay more.

The cities of Pennsylvania may open new streets upon a petition signed by a majority of the owners of property on the streets affected and levy the cost on the abutters. The municipality may assume a part of the expense. By reference to a statement of the comptroller of Pittsburg, which I shall attach to and make a part of my speech, it will be seen that the tendency to get something for nothing is by no means confined to the city of Washington.

The laws of these three States are fairly representative of all the laws of the other States.

The almost universal rule is to levy the greater part of the first or original expense of street extension against abutters as the principal beneficiaries.

WHO ARE THE BENEFICIARIES?

In some States the constitutional provisions are such that benefits can not be set off against damages. In others benefits can not be set off against the land seized, but may be set off against damages to the rest of it. In others the benefits may be set off against the value of the land as well as against incidental injuries. And the latter ruling is supported by the weight of authority in the greater number of States.

Elliott in his Roads and Highways, page 557, lays down the rule in these words:

> Where the property fronts on the street improved then it may be said, as a matter of law, that it is benefited to the extent of the improvement, and on this assumption assessments on frontage may be sustained on principle.

THE ALMOST UNIVERSAL RULE.

It is an almost universal rule in all American cities that the expense of new streets is to be cast arbitrarily upon abutters, as the principal beneficiary. And logically, if they are not benefited to the extent of this expense, but yet at the same time they ask for it, who else is?

Subject to this, if it can be shown that other and adjoining property is benefited, it may be assessed with the abutters.

And lastly, as the general public obtains an easement in the street, it may be called a beneficiary and may be assessed. But, except in rare cases, this assessment against the public is for the least part of the expense, and in the great majority of cases bears no expense whatever.

Right here, however, it may be said that Washington holds a position sui generis. Washington has a system of streets which are in common like the streets of all other cities, but it also has in addition a plan which demands a system of streets unlike the streets of any other American city, a system which might be termed national in character. And it is but just that to the extent of the excess of expense created by this plan the assessment should be not against abutters, nor against the revenues of the District of Columbia, but upon the revenues of the United States.

THE APPLICATION.

The special statutes of the District of Columbia vary and lead to inequalities and incongruities. Why one set of men should put up collateral in order to obtain the opening of a street and not another? Why on some streets 100 per cent of all the damages shall be assessed against benefits and only 50 per cent or less in others? Why one set of men should pay 10 per cent interest annually and another 4 per cent? Why men on one extension of Kalorama avenue should be required to pay all of the damages and men on another extension of the same avenue 50 per cent or less? Why M street and Rittenhouse street should each be required to dedicate two-thirds of the land and pay 10 per cent on deferred asessments, while each of the other eleven streets named in the other eleven acts require no dedication and charge a less per cent? Why Sixteenth street should be improved at the expense of the public and other streets at the expense of the beneficiaries? Why one section of the city of Washington receives all the benefits of this special street improvement at the expense of all the other sections?

These are all vital questions. They show that the laws are incongrous and need revision. To this end I have introduced a bill.

A few words in explanation of the bill:

This bill modifies and reenacts the highway act of 1893 and chapter 55 of the code of 1901, as the latter is amended. These acts seem to me to be in the main just and reasonable; but after investigation and reflection I am persuaded that they are defective in three or four particulars, and have attempted to provide a remedy for those defects.

The general and fair understanding of the situation in Washington is that there are three parties in interest in every case of opening a new street or avenue in this District—first, the person whose property is taken for that purpose; second, the District of Columbia, and, third, the United States; and that the burdens ought to be equitably distributed among these parties. The United States controls the laying out of streets, avenues, county roads, and suburban streets, through a commission consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Chief of Engineers, for the time being. The national authority, and not the local authority, thus controls the subject, and acts solely with a view to national interests in developing here a city conformable in all its parts to the magnificent plan designed by L'Enfant and Washington for a national capital, and not for a county town. The streets are often of 160 feet in width and many miles in length. The case is entirely different from that of other cities. My bill, therefore, provides that the United States shall pay one-third of all damages for property taken for streets exceeding 80 feet in width, and shall be made a party to, and be represented by its attorney for this District, in all condemnation proceedings relating to such streets.

It also provides for allowing the District to issue bonds not exceeding $2,000,000 annually, and not exceeding $30,000,000 in all, in order to provide a fund for the payment of the damages awarded against it in such condemnation proceedings.

It secures to any party aggrieved by the final order of the supreme court of the District in any such proceedings the right of appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District.

As to minor streets and alleys and county roads not exceeding 60 feet in width, it adopts the provisions of the District Code as amended by the act of March 3, 1901, which do not require the United States to pay anything, the matter being considered purely local.

I believe that under the plan I have proposed the burden of expense incident to the development of the capital city may be made to fall with reasonable impartiality upon the parties upon whom it justly and equitably should rest. Equality in the imposition of the burden is of the highest importance, and though absolute equality and absolute justice are never attainable, the adoption of some rule or system tending to that end is indispensable. I believe that the plan suggested would save a great deal of money to the United States by convincing the people here that we mean to treat them fairly, and thereby inducing them to act justly toward the Government of the United States. If we attempt to compel them at their sole expense to execute the magnificent plans of improvement prepared by the officers of the United States for the aggrandizement of the national capital, they will simply recoup by awarding exorbitant damages against the United States for all lands taken for its use, and in the long run we shall be losers and not gainers by an unjust policy. They will also continue to endeavor to obtain special legislation through Congress, as they have been doing since 1888.

My object is to put an end to abuses now existing, and to hereafter carry on street openings in a systematic way under fair and impartial general laws.

To refer for a moment again to the faults of the present system, they are, to my mind—

1. The special laws enacted by Congress interfere with the proper development of the general law.

2. The general law does not give the citizens of the District sufficient power of initiative and results in extravagant improvements, unnecessary improvements, and favoritism in the selection of improvements.

3. For minor streets and alleys in a single block (that is, streets 60 feet wide or less), the code places the initiative in the citizens. When a majority of property owners in such block ask for an improvement the Commissioners are directed to make it. This is right as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough.

The right to form special improvement districts should be given by general statute. These districts should be permitted to take in any length of street or any area upon which streets have not been already laid out. Let a majority of the citizens owning abutting property petition for the improvement and then cast upon abutting property a certain proportion of the cost of condemnation and the first or original cost of the improvement. This is a stimulus to local pride.

4. Streets in kind like streets of other cities—80 feet wide or less—should be paid for like streets in other cities, a certain part on abutting property and a certain part by the District of Columbia. For such streets one half should be borne by the abutters and the other half by the District.

5. For extraordinary streets, more than 80 feet wide, the United States should pay one-third, the District of Columbia one-third, and the abutters one-third.

6. In other cities the opening and improvement of streets is facilitated by an issue of bonds. Authority to do that in Washington would break down favoritism and result in a general improvement of all sections. A sinking fund should be created. Assessments made upon abutters for from ten to twenty years, for their proportionate part of every improvement and the necessary interest, and upon the entire property of the District for the remaining part, would provide a fund to retire bonds issued to run at from ten to twenty years.

7. The figures submitted herewith show that the moneys heretofore appropriated for street extension, street improvement, and even for street repairs, have been used too much for one part of the city to the exclusion of the rightful demands of all other parts.

The following figures, taken from the Engineer's Report for the years 1903, 1904, and 1905, for work on streets, avenues, county roads and suburban streets, and repairs to asphalt, show the glaring inequalities in distribution of appropriation by the Commissioners of the District:

Total improvements in west Washington, $706,164, or 77.7 per cent.
Total improvements in east Washington, $225,865, or 22.3 per cent.
Total amount to the Northwest, $662,272, or 72.5 per cent.
Total amount to the Northeast, $118,046, or 11.1 per cent.
Total amount to the Southeast, $107,819, or 11 per cent.
Total amount to the Southwest, $43,892, or 5.4 per cent.

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS IN OTHER CITIES.

Pittsburg.—Improvements of a general character are distributed upon abutters and the city in the ratio of two-thirds upon abutters to one-third upon the city. Improvements of strictly local character are cast upon abutters.

The city comptroller of Pittsburg in his report for 1904–5 said:

"A practice which in its inception was intended to relieve hardships in deserving and exceptional cases has grown to such proportions as to become a great and grievous wrong. In outlining public improvements care should be exercised in determining their scope and whether local or general in their character. If general and affecting the community as well as abutting property, the charge against the work might with justice be distributed and the city regarded as a beneficiary; but where the benefits are merely local the city should not be assessed with any portion of the work. It seems to have been the practice in late years, and is rapidly growing, of getting all the improvements that can be had at other people's expense. In other words, local improvements are very often made where the benefits are not equal to the damages, and the difference is charged to the city. * * * I do not believe that in many of these cases, and the books are full of them, that the general public is benefited in any way, and some plan should be adopted by which this practice of improving any portion of the local thoroughfares at the expense of the general public should be stopped."

St. Louis.—This city formerly cast the cost of improvements upon the frontage. This was changed so as to lay special taxation against particular pieces of property as benefits. The auditor for 1905 says that this system produces greater inequalities than the old system, and that it is complicated, ill defined, and provocative of litigation. In neither case is the cost cast upon the city, except where the city may be an abutter or benefited. The total amount, however, paid by the city in condemnation proceedings under either system since 1887, a period of nineteen years, was $331,234, or about $17,400 a year.

Buffalo.—Street extensions, grade crossings, and sewer improvements are made by the city, and the expense assessed against the streets or districts benefited thereby. Bonds are issued and a sinking fund created. A certain amount of the indebtedness is cast upon the frontage and the remainder upon a district locally benefited.

Boston.—The cost for extending streets is cast upon abutters. Bonds are issued as in Buffalo, a sinking fund created, and assessments made against the abutting property or the property of the district benefited.

Cost of actual condemnations in Washington.

Year.	Street.	Damages.	Benefits.
1902	Sixteenth street	$729,952	$108,834
1902	Eckington place	5,968	2,023
1902	Adams Mill road	6,092	----------
1905	Euclid place	14,608	7,400
1905	Highways on east and west sides of the Zoological Park.	51,627	23,506
Total		808,247	141,763

In all of the other improvements, twelve in number, the benefits were about equal to the damages. The total damages in eleven of these only amounted to about $50,000. From this it appears that this system works well upon small improvements, but opens the way for speculative enterprise at the cost of the city in large improvements. Street extensions in 1902 cost $1,086,676; street improvements cost $618,387; care and lighting, $936,019. Total, streets, exclusive of bridges and sewers, $2,641,000.

Be it enacted, etc., That except as modified or repealed by this act all the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 2d day of March, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," shall be and remain in full force and effect, and that all the powers given to the Commissioners and others thereby shall also apply to and be capable of being exercised within the limits of the cities of Washington and West Washington (formerly Georgetown), and upon and through any addition thereto, whenever it may be necessary to open or connect streets within the said cities, or streets lying partly within and partly beyond the limits thereof.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where any street, avenue, county road, or suburban street which may be laid out and established in pursuance of this act or the act of March 2, 1893, aforesaid, shall exceed 80 feet in width, the amount awarded by the court as damages for such highway or part thereof condemned and established, together with the entire first or original cost of the improvement, shall be assessed one-third against the land abutting upon the street or streets to be improved to a depth of 150 feet on each side thereof and the other two-thirds shall be charged to the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in equal proportions, and the damages awarded for all reservations which may be condemned and established shall be charged wholly to the Treasury of the United States; that for all streets 80 feet in width or under the entire amount of the damages and the entire first or original cost of the improvement shall be assessed one-half against the abutting property on each side of the improvement to a depth of 150 feet and the other half shall be charged to the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where any street, alley, suburban street, or county road shall be not more than 80 feet in width and confined to a single block, the amount awarded by the court as damages shall be ascertained and paid in the manner prescribed by the act approved the 23d of February, 1905, entitled "An act to amend chapter 55 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia,'" relating to the opening of minor streets and alleys in the said District; and all other provisions of the said chapter 55 of the act of March 3, 1901, not inconsistent with this act or the said acts of March 2, 1893, and February 23, 1905, shall be and remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 4. That in case citizens of the District of Columbia shall, by petition filed with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and signed by at least one-half of the owners of property abutting upon any highway, street, or streets of the District of Columbia, or of property lying within the boundaries of any special improvement district or area to be established within the boundaries of the District of Columbia, ask that a highway, street, or streets be improved, or opened and improved, under this act and the preceding acts and laws of which it is amendatory, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to improve or open and improve said highway, street, or streets in manner and form now provided by law for the improvement of existing streets, or the opening, extension, and improvement of new streets, or as said existing law shall be modified by this act.

SEC. 5. That in order to provide an available fund for the payment of the damages which may hereafter be awarded against the District of Columbia in the execution of the plan of street extension hereinbefore authorized and required, and for the first or original improvement thereof, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have authority to execute, issue, and sell, from time to time, as exigencies may require, bonds of the District of Columbia, not to exceed $2,000,000 in any one year, nor to exceed $30,000,000 in all, to be paid, principal and interest, fifty years from the date thereof and wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That any party aggrieved by the final order or decree of the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a district court, fixing the amount of damages or the assessment upon any parcel of land, may take an appeal therefrom to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia and shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions as in civil cases; and said court of appeals may affirm, reverse, or modify the order or decree appealed from: Provided, That said court of appeals shall consider only questions of law arising on such appeal, and that such appeal shall be taken within twenty days after the making of the final order or decree appealed from, and not afterwards, and shall be subject to existing laws and rules of court regulating appeals to said court of appeals from the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how much time the gentleman from Tennessee has remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, all I have to say in addition to what I have said is that I accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], and I do not think it would dishonor the memory of General Wheeler to name a street in the capital city for him. I think it would honor the city of Washington and, therefore, I heartily accept the amendment.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman does not desire to use the balance of his time?

Mr. SIMS. Unless some gentleman wants to speak on the side I am representing I do not care to use any further time.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the extension of streets of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11 strike out the word "Samson" and insert the word "Wheeler." Strike out all after the word "late," in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof "Gen. Joseph Wheeler;" so it will read: "Wheeler street, in honor of the late Gen. Joseph Wheeler."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill changing the names of Pierce place, Blake street, Swann street, Cedar street or place, and Oregon avenue to Wheeler street."

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, there are no further bills to bring up.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 1056) granting a pension to Galon S. Clevenger, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 849) granting an increase of pension to Horatio Carter.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 1330) granting an increase of pension to William A. Hildreth, the beneficiary of said bill having died.

GENERAL BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 6009.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up as unfinished business the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6009) to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters.

Mr. MANN. The bill has been read, Mr. Speaker. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall use the thirty minutes that have been yielded to me. It may be, as the gentleman has said, that there is not very much in this bill, that it is not one of very great importance. It is a bill dealing with the general subject of constructing bridges across navigable streams in the United States. This matter is a part of the broad subject of interstate commerce. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and has been reported back by unanimous decision of that committee, under their power to inquire into questions touching the regulation of interstate commerce. It is intended to be a bill for the purpose of authorizing railway corporations to construct bridges across navigable rivers, and yet not once does the bill mention the word "corporation," but only refers to persons.

Mr. MANN. May I interrupt the gentleman to say the gentleman is mistaken?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. The last section of the bill provides that the word "persons" shall include "corporations," so it does mention corporations.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, yes; I was speaking of the first section. It starts out authorizing persons to construct bridges, and winds up in the last clause by saying that "persons" shall mean "corporations."

In one place it is provided that the plans and specifications and drawings are submitted to the Secretary of War; then, under such provision, whether he approves those plans and specifications or not, the corporations or persons would be authorized to proceed with the construction of the bridge. The next clause requires that the plans shall be approved by the Secretary of War. In other words, under the first part of the section, no matter whether the Secretary of War has approved the plans and specifications, the individuals or corporations can proceed with the construction of the bridge.

Mr. MANN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure but that the gentleman's criticism may be correct. At least, it is my intention to ask the House to amend the bill by striking out "or" and insert "nor."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think that is correct, and that will remove the difficulty. The gentlemen have spoken of the care bestowed in the preparation of this bill. With all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois and other members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I wish to say that it strikes me that the bill has not been as carefully drawn as it should be on a great subject like this. On to-morrow the House begins the consideration of the broad subject of regulating interstate commerce, and to-day we have before this body a bill that invades that great subject to a large extent. The language of this bill, it seems to me, has not been chosen with the utmost precision.

Now, let me refer to one or two other loose expressions in it. The bill requires that the plans and specifications be submitted to the Chief of Engineers and to the Secretary of War. The Chief of Engineers is under the Secretary of War, and if they ought to be submitted to the War Department, why not say that they shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, because the Chief of Engineers must act as the Secretary of War says. And it seems to me that that might become important under certain conditions.

I shall not discuss the various sections. But let me refer to section 3 of this bill, on page 3. In the latter part of that section I find this language—and this, I think, is one of the most objectionable features of the bill:

If tolls shall be charged for the transit over any bridge constructed under the provisions of this act, of engines, cars, street cars, wagons, carriages, vehicles, animals, foot passengers, or other passengers, such tolls shall be reasonable and just, and the Secretary of War may, at any time, and from time to time, prescribe the reasonable rates of toll for such transit over such bridge, and the rates so prescribed shall be the legal rates and shall be the rates demanded and received for such transit.

There in that section is conferred upon the Secretary of War the great power of fixing and establishing the rates and tolls over bridges across navigable streams in this country; for instance, the power applies to the bridge at St. Louis across to East St. Louis; at Cairo across the river; at Memphis, and bridges across the other rivers of this country. It authorizes the Secretary of War to fix the tolls that shall be charged. Mr. Speaker, this may be in the estimation of some gentlemen very innocent language, but I undertake to say that whenever this body confers the great rate-making power on the Secretary of War and withdraws that power from the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and also from the various State commissions of the respective States of this Union, and thus fixes the tolls on the bridges, a great power has been conferred, and one that certainly should be handled with conservatism. I have been reminded that such a provision as this has been in practically all of the bridge bills that have been passed. I believe that was the statement, was it not, the other day? I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. It is customary to put that provision in all bills where tolls are permitted to be charged for passage over the bridge. It has been done for many years, I think.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, as a general rule that is correct, but when the power of fixing rates across these bridges was conferred upon the Secretary of War originally the Interstate Commerce Commission had not been created. And because there was no other power to determine this question, and it must be submitted to some jurisdiction, it was remitted to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, for the reason that he had charge of the navigable streams of this country, their improvement, etc.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to remind the gentleman from Texas that these provisions in these bills, and the provision in this bill can, of course, have no application to the hundreds of cases of bridges across nonnavigable streams which will be under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, provided we ever succeed in passing such a bill. But it is put in these bridge bills to provide for bridges over navigable rivers, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, for the reason that work upon navigable streams is done under the supervision of the Secretary of War, and such restrictions and conditions as we place upon our consent for them to put bridges across navigable rivers are usually for that reason placed within the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. So far that is all right. I do not object to this question generally being put under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, but now here is a question of rate making for these bridges conferred on the Secretary of War that he has had heretofore. The time has come when it should cease. It should be put under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the railroad commissions of the various States.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I remind the gentleman that that power has never yet been given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we still hear dire threats that it never shall be done.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. With the aid of the "Republican party first and the Lord next," we hope we will begin the consideration of a bill to-morrow that will pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. But this House alone can not fix it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We can by an amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will permit me. Of course this bill is designed primarily to shorten the time and labor of the House in consideration of bridge bills. If it were even proper, I think the gentleman is mistaken in thinking it would be proper to give this power to the Interstate Commission in all cases that would involve controversy, which would prevent the enactment of this bill into law in all probability. If this bill is enacted now, the law containing this provision giving to the Secretary of War the power—it being admitted that somebody ought to have the power—and then we enact the bill which our committee has reported and which comes up for consideration to-morrow, that of itself will confer that power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as it relates to interstate commerce, notwithstanding the provisions of this bill, and to that extent would repeal the provisions of this bill. So that the difficulty is practically a difficulty, I will say, in legislation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It might and it might not be so construed. Only the other day we passed a bill with reference to Sabine River, between Louisiana and Texas. There was no provision in that bill authorizing the Secretary of War to fix rates, and that was an interstate river.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, we do not put into ordinary bridge bills any reference to the Secretary of War fixing the rate for crossing the bridge. If we pass a bill simply for a railroad, for instance, we do not undertake in any case to determine the rate over the bridge as apart from the rate over the railroad; but in many cases a bridge is erected, however, over a stream over which there is no railroad, but it is for foot passengers and vehicles. It has always been the custom in those bills, where a toll is permitted to be charged, to put in a provision that the Secretary of War shall have the right to fix the tolls, in order that the company may not charge extortionate tolls.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand the gentleman.

Here is this power conferred upon the Secretary of War. Tomorrow we will begin the consideration of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which in its very first section puts all bridges across navigable streams and used in connection with railroads under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This may become a very important question, I say, wherever rates are established or tolls charged, that the power establishing rates and tolls should give public hearings; that the people who complain of them should have the right to go into some forum and make complaint and have their case tried, and not have it adjudicated by some clerk in the War Department.

It may be that I am magnifying the difficulties of this proposition. But let us see. There is a bridge from St. Louis to East St. Louis. Millions and millions of tons of freight are carried over that bridge. The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission inform me that we have had considerable trouble in reference to the freight rates across that bridge. There have arisen many controversies. Put it in the power of the Secretary of War to fix those rates without a hearing, without a trial, without anyone complaining of them, and then you let the Interstate Commerce Commission fix the rates on all the great railways of this country, the charges across the bridge being a part of the freight rate; then you have rates fixed by two different jurisdictions—one, in an arbitrary manner, by the Secretary of War, the other by the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon hearing and with a public trial. Is it not easy to understand how freight from many of the commercial centers of the country, from a vast section, from many States in the Union, might be diverted or changed by a charge across one of these important bridges? Is it not easy to see that there might be that conflict of jurisdiction? I submit to the House, in all candor, that it would be better to put these great bridges of the country under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body, in my judgment, admirably equipped to ascertain what the true charges and tolls should be, not only upon the railroads of the country, but across the bridges, which are a part and parcel of them.

That feature of section 3 should be stricken out so as to put this question under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. With that out of it I see no particular objection to the bill; but with that section in there—withdrawing the bridges from the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and from the jurisdiction of every railroad commission in every State in this Union—there is danger in such legislation, and there is certainly a very serious prospect of a conflict of jurisdiction.

Then you go to section 4, and you find that there is an effort to fix a penalty. Now, listen to the language used to fix a penalty:

> That any persons who shall fail or refuse to comply with the lawful order of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this act, and any persons who shall be guilty of a violation of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and every month such persons shall remain in default shall be deemed a new offense and subject such persons to additional penalites therefor.

What court has jurisdiction? Is it a civil penalty or is it a penal statute imposing a fine? Is that language plain enough? Is it intelligible? Under that power could you haul up the officers of a railroad who violate the provisions of this statute and punish them when no reference is made to corporations except in the last section of this bill? On a great subject like this should not more care be required in expressing the will and intention of Congress?

Such suggestions I desired to make, and believe that they are appropriate to the subject, that this measure should not contain such a provision, authorizing the construction of bridges for all future time in this country, conferring unbridled power upon the Secretary of War, who can not give this matter his personal attention, but must necessarily refer it to some assistant or some clerk in the War Department. It seems to me that this matter should be relegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulties under which the gentleman from Texas labors, as well as the rest of us, in legislation of this sort. We wish to pass a bill which can be passed without too much waiting in this body, or in another body that sometimes acts upon measures. The purpose of this bill is partly to relieve the House and the committees and the departments of the tedium of constant investigation as to the terms of various bills, and partly in order that bridges shall be constructed upon uniform terms.

When I say to the gentlemen of the House that in the last Congress we passed one hundred different bridge bills, all of which required the attention of the War Department as to their special provisions, all of which required and received the attention of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as to their provisions, all of which required the attention and time of the House, both in reading and in consideration of their provisions, the gentleman will understand the purpose of the bill. It is to relieve the House of this extra labor.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] says that it is a mistake to give to the Secretary of War the authority to regulate the matter of tolls over bridges where tolls are to be charged. Let me first say to the gentleman and to the House that that provision does not in any way affect the charging of railroad fares. It does not affect the railroad question, or the regulation of railway rates. That will be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission. But here is a bridge located over a stream in a State, for the use of foot passengers, for the use of vehicles. The Interstate Commerce Commission has no jurisdiction and no method of trying that case.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Do you contend that because a river happens to be wholly within a State, and not between two States, it can not be a navigable stream and can not be under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War for the improvement of rivers and harbors?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman entirely misunderstood me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understood you to say that a river within a State and a bridge across that river could not come within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MANN. I said that a bridge wholly within a State was not under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to fixing the rate of fare over it, and it is not.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But it could be if it was a navigable river, could it not?

Mr. MANN. There is no provision now in law, and there will be none by any bill that has passed, giving that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I agree with the gentleman that in this bill we could reserve that power, but here is a bridge from a town to the other side of the river, the town being located on one side of that river. The bridge is built, not for railway purposes, but for wagons and the travel over it—for passengers and traffic wholly within the State. Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission has no jurisdiction——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I know it has not, but the Commission could certainly be vested with the jurisdiction to fix the rates over a bridge of that sort that might impede navigation of a river of that kind, else how could Congress take jurisdiction over a river wholly within a State for purposes of making it open to navigation, except under the bill regulating interstate commerce?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, the power which Congress has over streams wholly within the State is a negative power. We have power and control over the streams to say that a bridge company can not construct a bridge except upon certain terms, but we could not force the construction of the bridge. It is true we can reserve in this bill, or in any bill we pass, the power of the Secretary of War to regulate the tolls, or give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to regulate the rates. But the Interstate Commerce Commission would not proceed under the power which we propose to confer upon it by the Hepburn bill or which it now has for the regulation of interstate commerce, and there is no procedure provided for.

Now, it does not seem to the committee—and remember, gentlemen, that the same committee which reported this bill into the House unanimously (and this specific matter was considered by the committee) has also unanimously reported a bill giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix rates—we did not think it was feasible to put upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will have work enough to do to regulate railway rates, the duty of determining what should be the rate for foot passengers and vehicles passing over a local bridge. The matter does not interfere or affect the general railway rates or railway lines. The Interstate Commerce Commission will have all the power that would otherwise be conferred upon it to say what the rates will be from one point to another, although the traffic passes over a bridge; and this will not interfere with that authority. It is purely a practical question, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, and this decision was arrived at after considerable study. It may be that we are mistaken, because we are not proud of our opinions; it is likely we may be mistaken, but the committee dealing with the question believed it was better to follow the precedents upon the subject and leave to the Secretary of War, after hearing, the authority to decide, not for the regulation of commerce between the States, but for the protection of the local people desiring to use it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In Texas we are about to open up two great rivers to navigation. We have begun a system of locks and dams on two of these rivers, the Trinity and the Brazos rivers. Does the gentleman contend that the language of this bill does not authorize the Secretary of War to fix the toll charges across bridges that are to be constructed hereafter over these streams to the exclusion of the railroad commission of the State of Texas? In other words, is not the language plain that if hereafter a bridge is authorized over a stream that the Government has begun to improve by a system of locks and dams, that then the State government will have no jurisdiction to determine the question of tolls because it has already been lodged in the Federal Government—in the War Department?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell me whether both of these rivers are wholly within the State of Texas so far as their navigability is concerned?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That makes no difference.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman kindly answer?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. They are wholly within the State.

Mr. MANN. Then this bill does not apply to them at all.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It can apply to them, and that is the contention I am making. In the case of Gibbons against Ogden it was decided that the rivers that run through the State could be a part of interstate commerce; it was a traffic that moved over the river, and here you are withdrawing it from the power of the State to control it as far as the bridges are concerned.

Mr. MANN. The law now provides that the Secretary of War may regulate the construction of bridges over rivers wholly within the State. I do not think this bill applies to any river in the State of Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am afraid it does.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to be willing to take our statement as to the law. The law now provides that the Secretary of War may fix conditions upon which he permits bridges to be erected wholly within the State.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But not that he shall fix the rates and charges.

Mr. MANN. But he can reserve that right.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The law as it now exists does not give any such authority, only that he shall control the construction of the bridges.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT. To what extent does the power of the Secretary of War now go on streams wholly within the limits of the State? That is, what is the extent of the power of the respective legislatures of the States and the extent of the power of the Secretary of War in regard to the construction of bridges across streams?

Mr. MANN. As I said before, the right, so far as the Government is concerned, is a mere license, a right to prevent the construction of bridges, and under the existing statute the Secretary of War is authorized, so far as the Government is concerned, to give consent to the erection of bridges over any stream wholly within the limits of a State. Of course, the power to construct the bridges must be derived from the State itself, but the Government does not interfere with the right to do this. In other words, the power of the Government is not exercised to regulate interstate commerce, but to prevent the interference with navigation and navigable streams, and the Government merely waives its right in behalf of persons who must obtain their authority elsewhere.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under the gentleman's bill, what opportunity would one have to express his opposition to certain bridge bills? Would he have to go to the Secretary of War?

Mr. MANN. Under this bill, Mr. Speaker, there must still be a bill passed through Congress in each case. It has not been considered desirable by the committee reporting the bill to transfer the whole authority to the Secretary of War. I may say to the gentleman that up to within a few years ago there was no Federal control over the matter of building bridges over streams, and the result was that until Congress assumed control of that matter it became a common thing to erect bridges which did interfere with navigation, and all over the country there are now bridges which do interfere with navigation, put there before Congress prohibited that. Finally Congress passed a law providing that no bridges should be built across navigable streams until the consent of Congress should be obtained, except that in rivers wholly navigable within a State the Secretary of War might give that consent. This bill simply provides that when Congress shall hereafter grant authority to build a bridge it shall be upon the terms named in this bill, the terms being those usually insisted upon by the committee of the two Houses having jurisdiction, and by Congress itself.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And special bills must be introduced hereafter?

Mr. MANN. Special bills will still have to be brought in, the theory of the committee being that the Member of Congress from the district is, after all, the best one to judge in ordinary cases as to whether the bridge should be permitted to be constructed at all at the place, but that uniform regulations ought to be provided in those cases, unless exceptional circumstances exist; and if exceptional circumstances do exist in any case, the Member of Congress from the district who introduces the bill can make provision for that in his bill and show the exceptional circumstances.

Mr. SHEPPARD. How will a saving of time be effected if bills must still be introduced as heretofore and receive consideration as heretofore?

Mr. MANN. As I say, we passed through the last Congress 100 different bridge bills. The ordinary bill covers from one to five pages of the bill page size, and covers a considerable space in the statutes. If this bill be enacted into law all that will be required in an ordinary case will be the introduction of a bill which will read like this:

Be it enacted, etc., That the John Doe Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Richard Roe River, at or near Black Acre, in the State of ———, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters, approved ——— ——, 190—."

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the question has been considered whether it would not be well to insert a provision that a public hearing shall be granted before the privilege of constructing a bridge is given? I will say in that connection that in many instances bridges have been constructed across navigable streams which proved a serious obstruction to navigation, and the nature of the obstruction was not understood until the structure had actually appeared.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that that matter has been considered. It is not the practice in ordinary bills to require a public hearing to be had, and undoubtedly would meet with some objection. Now, these bills still have to pass through Congress, and if the gentleman has observed in these matters, as doubtless he has, when a bridge bill is passed through Congress notice is always given in the press generally, and especially in the local press in that locality, so that people are put upon notice, and it is the uniform custom of the War Department, where protest is made, to grant a hearing upon these propositions.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is, for the local engineer to grant a hearing.

Mr. MANN. For the local engineer and even for the Chief of Engineers in Washington, for either to grant a hearing if requested.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would like to ask further in regard to a provision granting the right to other companies to obtain the use of the bridge under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe. Was it thought best to omit that provision?

Mr. MANN. We provide here that if tolls shall be charged, then the Secretary of War shall fix the tolls. That practically means fixing it so that anybody can use the bridge, and if a company desires to build a bridge solely for its own use we have not considered that it should be required thereafter to turn the bridge over to the use of some other company.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Is it not true that the impediment to navigation would be greatly lessened if in some cases two or three or even four railways might occupy the same bridge and they could do so without inconveniencing themselves?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly that is true in some cases, and we have considered that in such cases the Secretary of War, who reports upon all these bridge bills which are introduced, will so inform the committee or the Member of Congress who introduces the bill that we may put in a provision to that effect, but it is not desirable, as a general thing, to require a company which builds a bridge to give the use of it to some other company.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. One question about the phraseology of the bill. On page 4, section 4, at the beginning it is provided that any persons who shall fail or refuse to comply with a lawful order issued by the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers, made in accordance with the provisions of this act, etc. I do not notice on a cursory reading where the Chief of Engineers has the right to make affirmative orders which must be observed. Are not the orders with reference to modification, etc., all made by the Secretary of War?

Mr. MANN. I think it may be that the criticism is just. We have originally, in section 3, a provision giving the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers authority to make an order notifying persons to change a bridge, and we strike out of that the Chief of Engineers, leaving the order to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Well, should not the words "or Chief of Engineers" be stricken out in lines 9 and 10, on page 4?

Mr. MANN. Well, there is a provision in section 4, in another place on page 5:

> Or the order or direction of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers made in pursuance thereof may be enforced by injunction.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The thought of the committee, I take it, was it would do no harm to have it there?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands, I think, very well—the other Members of the House ought to—that in framing the bill the way we have and saying the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers, we have followed the lead of the very distinguished gentleman himself who is chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I am not entirely certain that the Chief of Engineers ought to appear in here at all, but we have taken the lead of the gentleman who has inserted this item invariably in the river and harbor appropriation bills, concluding it is his superior knowledge and his superior judgment upon the subject.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I think I may say to the gentleman it was not due to knowledge, but to experience. There have been at least two cases where the Chief of Engineers made regulations for safeguarding navigation in which cases the Secretary of War overruled him, and I think very much to the disadvantage of navigation.

Mr. MANN. I have always followed the lead of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio on all matters relating to rivers and harbors, and I have had no doubt he had the best of reasons for putting in the river and harbor act of 1899 and other acts the words "Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers," and so we followed that provision.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Of course it is known that these questions in the first instance are referred to the Chief of Engineers, and his conclusions are, at least in a great majority of cases, accepted with only very partial consideration by the Secretary of War—if the gentleman will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Only for a moment. I thoroughly believe in a general way in this bill. It prevents encumbering the statutes with these lengthy provisions which are in almost exactly the same language. It saves the time of the House and of the committee. There is another good result which will naturally follow which has not been mentioned, namely, that regulations and provisions will be uniform, and such favoritism or discrimination as might arise from the framing of separate bills for each bridge will be prevented.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] one question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the gentleman ever considered the proposition of taking this bridge-bill business clear out of the House by some sort of a general bill?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think it would be possible. There have been a couple of decisions of the Supreme Court upon that subject. This bill refers, as regards the making of regulations and the modifications, merely to bridges hereafter to be constructed or authorized. It would be very doubtful whether the Secretary of War could demand that a modification could be made in a bridge already constructed without any restrictions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I was trying to get at is this: All of us are sick and tired of passing bridge bills here; and what I was trying to find out was, is there any way to pass a bill here that would confer on anybody the power to take charge of the whole subject, so that we will never hear of any more of these bridge bills?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think so. It seems to me the legislature should act upon the questions of policy involved in the building of bridges. Suppose a railway desires to build a bridge across a river without a draw, and the navigation interests desire that there shall be one. The question raised is the comparative hardship which the two interests will suffer and the general policy to be pursued. The legislature, and not an executive body, should decide.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have in mind the gentleman's statement about the power of Congress to authorize the Secretary of War or some other Department head to take charge of the business of bridge building. The courts, it is true, have held that the building of bridges over navigable waters is a regulation of commerce, but I think, under the decisions of the courts, that Congress would have the power to provide that any corporation or individual could build a bridge over any navigable stream upon certain conditions and with certain safeguards, and Congress then authorize the Secretary of War, for instance, to ascertain as a matter of fact whether the conditions existed or the safeguards were followed, and certify the fact; and the corporation who received the certificate would be authorized then to go on and construct a bridge; and that would not be, within the meaning of the law, a delegation of legislative power, but simply the ascertainment of the facts. And it occurred to me that a bill might well be prepared conferring in that way the whole business upon the Secretary of War, unless there is some reason why the Congress wanted to reserve that power itself, and there may be reasons why it should do so.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I question very much whether that could be done as a matter of legal power. The regulations would be of so great a variety and the discretion would be so very large it seems to me it could not be conferred on the Executive Department. But as a question of general policy, in addition to what I have said, I do not believe it would be best. There are numerous cases in the country where the question arises as to which is the best way to build a bridge, whether near to the level of the water or well elevated above it; whether with or without a draw; also which is the more important, to accommodate traffic across it or navigation through or under it. There is also the question whether a bridge should be built at all. These questions are of such national importance that it would seem to me entirely undesirable to leave them to the discretion of an executive officer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman bases his objection upon the question of policy he is right. But I think there is no doubt about the power of Congress to confer that authority in this way——

Mr. MANN. Whether Congress has the power or not, the fact is that when Congress did not exercise authority over this matter of bridge building bridges were constructed all over the land which then did or do now obstruct navigation, and there has yet been found no way of removing many of those obstructions, so that probably the jurisdiction of Congress is well retained.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but I feel very well satisfied with the manner in which he has maintained the cause of the committee before the House. As to the questions suggested by various gentlemen, however, I wish to remark that even if there were no legal doubt involved as to the possibility and practicability of providing to relegate this entire subject to the Secretary of War or any other authority, yet the practical and desirable consideration remains that exceptional conditions might often present themselves, rendering it desirable that Congress should have reserved to itself the power in order that special and exceptional provisions might be inserted in a bill to construct a particular bridge.

As to the modus operandi, the procedure after this bill is adopted will be clear and simple. Heretofore when bills were introduced for the construction of bridges they were very long. If not so when originally introduced, they were made so by amendments before they became law, containing the provisions which are thought by many of us in the course of legislation to be necessary to make the bills comply with the proper regulations of bridge construction. In this bill we seek to avoid the necessity for every committeeman and every Congressman and Senator and the Executive and everybody else who touches it to scan and study all these provisions in each separate bill. We simply refer to this bill and say such and such a corporation or party shall be authorized to build a bridge in conformity with this act. If any special conditions render special provisions desirable, we can add them to that short bill.

Now, as to the question raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], I suggest to him and other Members of the House that the jurisdictions of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Secretary of War over the control of bridges are not identical in extent nor are they even parallel. For instance, a bridge may be regulated by the Secretary of War because it is over a stream which, touching more than one State, the Government may at any time, at its pleasure, undertake to improve with a view to navigation. Yet that bridge, when constructed over that stream, might never be used in interstate commerce, but for entirely local accommodation and not subject to the interstate-commerce act at all. Such instances will comprise far the greatest number of cases contemplated by this bill.

On the contrary, a bridge over a very small, insignificant stream, nonnavigable and entirely within a State, which the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War will never touch, may nevertheless be under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, because it is a part of a through route for interstate commerce. I do not think there is any trouble about any of the matters suggested by my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY]. The committee has given due attention to this entire subject. For years we have endeavored to secure legislation of this sort, to do which required provisions which should be sufficiently satisfactory to a sufficient number of the Members of Congress to insure its passage. We tried to frame one which would promise all possible benefit, if not entire satisfaction, to everybody, which is usually impossible. This bill has secured the sanction of every member of the committee. It comes here with a unanimous report, and I believe it is as nearly satisfactory to the Members of this House as it is possible to make a similar bill.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Tennessee asked me first, and I yield to him.

Mr. GARRETT. The law now is, if I understand it correctly, that the Secretary of War may prescribe reasonable rates of tolls to be charged for passage over any bridge that is constructed under authority of a special act of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GARRETT. As I understand, the law now is that the Secretary of War may prescribe the toll or rate which shall be charged over a bridge that is constructed under a special act of Congress as to bridges over streams wholly within a State.

Mr. ADAMSON. As to the specific language about toll or rates, I do not remember, but this I will say: I will refer the gentleman to the river and harbor act of 1899, I believe it was, in which authority is conferred upon the Secretary of War to regulate and provide for and approve provisions for the construction of any bridge where the stream is entirely within one State. The general tenor of the act is that he shall have entire control of the construction of such bridge without the necessity of coming to Congress. As to what the exact words are about toll, I do not undertake to state.

Mr. GARRETT. The law, as I understand it, is that where the construction of the bridge is wholly within the limits of the State it does not require an act of Congress for that bridge.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is correct.

Mr. GARRETT. That is a matter of general law, passed by all the State legislatures, for the construction of bridges—at least it is in my State—prescribing the general condition under which a bridge can be constructed.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not charter a bridge company; we simply grant consent that a bridge may be constructed across a stream and impose the conditions of our consent. If the stream is entirely within a State, the conditions are imposed by the Secretary of War without coming to Congress.

Mr. GARRETT. Do you understand the Secretary of War to have the same power and authority to prescribe tolls as he chooses over every bridge that spans a stream running wholly in a State as he has over a stream that is interstate in character?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not remember exactly the language used in that act of 1899 about tolls, or whether the word is used or not. I only know that it provides that the bridge may be constructed under such regulations and specifications as may be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GARRETT. The point I am trying to get at is whether this particular bill here increases the power of the Secretary of War in regard to tolls in any way.

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not touch the power of the Secretary of War in the cases mentioned in the act of 1899 and has no relation to them, as I understand the matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are several typographical errors in the bill, which I should like to correct. In line 11, page 1, I move to amend by striking out "or" and inserting "nor."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 11, strike out "or" and insert "nor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. In line 9, page 3, strike out the word "unobstructive" and insert the word "unobstructed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 9, change the word "unobstructive" to "unobstructed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. In line 20, page 4, the word "work" should be made plural—"works."

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 4, line 20, insert a letter "s" after the word "work."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. In line 12, page 6, I propose to amend by inserting after the word "include" the words "municipalities, quasi municipal corporations;" so that the section will read:

That the word "persons" shall include municipalities, quasi municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "include," in line 12, page 6, insert the words "municipalities, quasi municipal corporations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who wishes to offer an amendment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in line 3, page 1, after the word "any," to insert the words "corporation or."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "any," in line 3, page 1, insert "corporation or."

Mr. MANN. I may say that it is all included in the bill at present.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now I offer this amendment, on page 4, line 3.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 4, strike out "Secretary of War" and insert "Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, that is an amendment taking the power of fixing tolls away from the Secretary of War and placing it under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HENRY of Texas, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 39.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment, on page 4, in line 14, to insert the words "in any court of competent jurisdiction" after the word "punished."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "punished," in line 14, page 4, insert "in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. MANN. There is no objection to that amendment. I think it is covered by the bill. I know it is covered by existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, one more amendment. In line 15, page 4, I move to strike out the word "month" and insert the word "day;" and after the word "persons" insert "or corporations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, page 4, strike out "month" and insert "day;" and after the word "persons" insert "or corporations."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Under the language of the bill one of these officials, or anyone violating the act, must violate it for a month before he becomes amenable to punishment, and I say that each day ought to be a separate offense. That is the effect of my amendment. The words "or corporation" were explained heretofore when I offered the other amendment, on page 1.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas is mistaken about its being necessary to violate the act for a month to make it an offense. It is not proposed to make it $5,000 a day because that is too onerous; $5,000 a month is onerous enough.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does it not say that every month they shall remain in default shall be an offense?

Mr. MANN. A new offense, a distinction the gentleman will recognize.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It must extend over a month. Let them quit violating the law.

Mr. MANN. There may be a conflict as to whether they have violated the law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman think that parties holding such monopoly as is held in St. Louis and Memphis could well afford to pay $5,000 a month?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that if such a case arises we are authorized under this bill to proceed by mandamus or injunction. There is a summary process provided for in this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They levy a toll of 25 cents on each man and $5 a car to cross that bridge.

Mr. MANN. Under this bill we could settle that by an injunction or mandamus or other similar process. We provide a method in here for settling just such questions of that sort.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not possible if you grant the right to charge for fixed tolls it may be abused?

Mr. MANN. It can not be abused, because we give authority to enforce the order of the Secretary of War by mandamus proceeding.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you or do you not know that in the face of the charter which provided that these bridges should never be owned by the same corporation, they have gone to work and consolidated the ownership so that they absolutely control the price of every car that goes into St. Louis, and that they have been trying to get the Secretary of War, for twelve months, to vacate the charter of the Merchants Bridge and have not succeeded, and St. Louis is as completely sewed up as if it were in a sack, as far as getting into it is concerned. It costs more to take a carload of coal across that bridge than it does to haul it from central Illinois to St. Louis.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly familiar with that case. The committee of which I am a member has reported bills to remedy it. If the old bridge had been constructed under the operation of this bill there would be no difficulty about it at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. MANN. That is one reason why we are trying to pass this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are certain committee amendments, and if there is no objection, they will be considered together.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference was changed of the bill (S. 3001) granting an increase of pension to Juliet A. Bainbridge-Hoff and an act (S. 2879) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Hoge, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Pensions.

REQUIRING RETURNS FROM CORPORATIONS.

Mr. JENKINS (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 2) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to make returns, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every corporation which may be hereafter organized shall, at the time of engaging in interstate or foreign commerce, file the return hereinafter provided for, and every corporation, whenever organized and engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, shall file annually, on or before February 1 of each year, a return with the Commissioner of Corporations for the year ending the preceding December 31, stating its name, date of organization, where and when organized, giving statutes under which it is organized, and all amendments thereof; if consolidated, naming constituent companies and where and when organized, with the same information as to such constituent companies, so far as applicable, as is herein required of such corporation; if reorganized, name of original corporation or corporations, with full reference to laws under which all the reorganizations have taken place, with the same information as to all prior companies in the chain of reorganization, so far as applicable, as is herein required of such corporation; amount of bonds issued and outstanding; amount of authorized capital stock, shares into which it is divided, par value, whether common or preferred, and distinction between each; amount issued and outstanding; amount paid in; how much, if any, paid in cash, and how much, if any, in property; if any part in property, describing in detail the kind, character, and location, with its cash market value at the time it was received in payment, giving the elements upon which said market value is based, and especially whether in whole or in part upon the capitalization of earnings, earning capacity, or economies, with the date and the cash price paid therefor at its last sale; the name and address of each officer, managing agent, and director; a true and correct copy of its articles of incorporation;

a full, true, and correct copy of any and all rules, regulations, and by-laws adopted for the management and control of its business and the direction of its officers, managing agents, and directors. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as relieving any corporation from making, in addition to the foregoing, such returns as are now required by the "Act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all amendments thereof, nor as relieving any corporation, corporate combination, or joint-stock company from any duty or liability imposed by the "Act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor," approved February 14, 1903, nor as limiting or restraining the powers conferred upon the Commission by said act; but the provisions of this act, as to signing and making oath to returns and making answers on oath to written inquiries, shall be applicable to returns and such answers made under said act and amendments thereof.

So far as any return may be a duplicate of one already filed hereunder, that fact may be stated, and the details which are in such case duplicates need not be repeated. Upon its being made to appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that without fault on its part it is impracticable for such corporation to furnish any of the items aforesaid, it may, by a written order of said Commissioner, be excused from furnishing such item or items.

Said Commissioner shall cause to be prepared a blank return for the use of such corporations, containing the foregoing requirements, and shall make such rules and regulations as may, in his judgment, be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The president, treasurer, and a majority of the directors of such corporation shall make oath in writing on said return that said return is true. The treasurer or other officer of such corporation having the requisite knowledge shall answer on oath all inquiries that may be made in writing on the direction of said Commissioner in relation to said return. Any corporation failing to make such return, or whose treasurer or other officer shall fail to make the answers aforesaid, may be restrained, on the suit of the United States, from engaging in interstate or foreign commerce until such return is made. Suit may be brought in any district of the United States at the election of the Attorney-General.

SEC. 2. That whoever knowingly swears to a return that is false in any material particular, or knowingly swears to an answer to any such inquiry that is false in any material particular, shall be deemed guilty of perjury and punished as provided in section 5392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Whoever shall knowingly prepare, or cause to be prepared, a return or answer that is false as aforesaid shall be deemed guilty of subornation of perjury and punished as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said Commissioner to cause to be prepared and published, on or before the 1st day of June in each year, a list of all corporations making returns, with an abstract of such returns, for free distribution in such number as said Commissioner may deem necessary to meet any reasonable and proper demand therefor, to be distributed under the direction of the Commissioner.

SEC. 4. That said Commissioner shall have the same authority to inquire into the management of the business of said corporations, relating to interstate and foreign commerce, in the same manner and to the same extent, with the same power to compel the attendance of, and the giving of testimony by, witnesses, and the production of books, papers, contracts, and agreements, as is provided in "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all amendments thereof. Said Commissioner may employ such agents and clerks as in his judgment may be necessary for properly executing the provisions of this act, and shall make an annual report to the President, containing, among other things, such specific recommendations for additional legislation as he may deem necessary.

Any corporation which shall neglect or refuse to make returns, and any person who shall neglect or refuse to make returns or who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify or answer any lawful inquiry hereinbefore provided for, or produce books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents, if in his custody, control, or power to do so, in obedience to the subpœna or lawful requirements of the Commissioner, shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000.

SEC. 5. That in all prosecutions, hearings, and proceedings under the provisions of this act, and under the provisions of "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, whether civil or criminal, no person shall be excused from attending and testifying, or from producing books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents before the courts of the United States or the commissioners thereof, or said Commissioner of Corporations or the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in obedience to the subpœna of the same on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said courts, commissioners, or Commissioner, or in obedience to the subpœna of either of them, in any such case or proceeding.

Testimony of witnesses under the provisions of the act to regulate interstate commerce and amendments thereof, and of this act, before said Commissioner shall be on oath, and said Commissioner may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. This section shall not be construed to enlarge the power or jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Corporations.

SEC. 6. That the several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of any of the provisions of section 1 of this act. It shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain the several acts therein forbidden. Such proceedings may be by way of petition, setting forth the case, and praying that the acts thereby made unlawful shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall be duly notified of such petition, the court shall proceed as soon as may be to the hearing and determination of the case, and upon such petition, and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order, injunction, or prohibition as shall be deemed just.

SEC. 7. That whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceedings under this act shall be pending that the ends of justice require that other parties shall be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district where the court is held or not, and subpœnas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be held to apply to corporations engaged in interstate commerce to which "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all amendments, applies.

SEC. 9. That this act shall take effect ———.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] such time as he may require for the purpose of making amendments.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how this bill is now before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is before the House on a call of committees.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise a question of jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee over this subject-matter. My understanding is that the subject that is involved in this bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for a specific purpose, and only for that, and that was to report in their judgment what the constitutional power of this House was with reference to certain subjects discussed in the message of the President.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not relate to that subject-matter.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think this bill does relate to that subject-matter, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say to the gentleman that this bill was received by the committee and acted upon by the committee long before the resolution to which he refers was sent from the House to the committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this suggestion, that this committee or this House could entertain this subject and legislate upon this subject solely because the Constitution gives to the Congress power over interstate commerce, and possibly those corporations engaging in it; if that is a correct statement, then I submit that this is a subject relating to commerce, that it does not belong to the Judiciary Committee, and that it is a usurpation on their part of the powers and duties of another committee to attempt legislation in this way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, may I make a statement——

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, I am making my statement simply by courtesy.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order that this is on the wrong Calendar under the rules of the House. It is a charge upon the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. One at a time, please.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order that this subject is not properly before the House, that it has not been reported by a committee having jurisdiction, and to remind gentleman that an erroneous assignment does not thereby give a committee right to consider the subject.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the further point of order that this bill should be on the Union Calendar, and not on the House Calendar.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, that is the point of order I had in mind a moment ago.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Just a word, Mr. Speaker. I will say that the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is entirely correct so far as the power that is sought to be exercised by the provisions of this bill is concerned. It does proceed altogether under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and the gentleman states absolutely correctly the legal situation in that respect. Now, I will state how the bill comes before the Committee on the Judiciary. In 1903 substantially all the provisions of this bill, with very trifling changes, were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the House. The bill was taken up by the House, discussed and debated, and passed the House on a roll call with only two negative votes. It went to the Senate and died in the Senate. In the last Congress this same bill was introduced and went to the Committee on the Judiciary again, and that committee reported it unanimously, but too late for action at the last session.

At this session, following exactly the course taken in 1903 and the course taken in 1904, the same bill was introduced and referred to the same committee. I have not examined the rule, and I am not able to discuss intelligently the question as to whether or not the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction. It does proceed under the interstate commerce clause. I do not quite understand that everything that relates to that belongs to the committee of which the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is the chairman, but under these circumstances and under these conditions it would almost seem that the practice of the House so far as this particular bill is concerned had vested the Judiciary Committee with the jurisdiction. That committee has no desire to usurp the jurisdiction of the committee of which the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is the chairman, but certainly under these circumstances we had a perfect right to feel that we were acting legitimately and properly in acting upon this measure and reporting it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to hear further discussion upon the point of order. The whole matter has been settled by former precedents in the House. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

667. The erroneous reference of a public bill, if it remain uncorrected, in effect gives jurisdiction to the committee receiving it. On October 19, 1893, Mr. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama, on behalf of the Committee on the Territories, presented for consideration the bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department.

Mr. W. A. Stone, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the bill, not being within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Territories, had been erroneously reported and was improperly on the Calendar.

The Speaker overruled the point, holding as follows:

"The reference of a public bill, as described by the rules, is different from that prescribed in regard to private bills. An erroneous reference of a public bill may be corrected any morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, either by unanimous consent or on motion of a member representing the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred, or on motion of the committee claiming jurisdiction. And where a public bill has been suffered, even erroneously, to be considered by a committee and that committee has reported it back to the House, there is no way of raising the question of jurisdiction if the bill is a public bill. The case is different in regard to private bills. This bill is practically an amendment of a charter granted to a railroad company to pass through lands in the Territories, which original bill was reported by the Committee on the Territories." (Parliamentary Precedents.)

The SPEAKER. The Chair is perfectly clear that it is not the practice of the House and that the question can not be raised in this way at this time as to——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the Speaker allow me to make a further suggestion on this subject? The action of the House in referring certain portions of the President's message to the Committee on the Judiciary with specific instructions as to the report and the character of the report, to go into the very root of jurisdiction or power of the House, it seems to me ought to have been an instruction to them not to report a bill. They were required first to report as to whether any power to enact a bill existed in this body or in the Congress, and that ought to be construed, it seems to me, by a committee of lawyers as a prohibition to engage in this particular form of report.

The SPEAKER. There is a second point of order, made by the gentleman from California, and also by the gentleman from Illinois, that this bill should be upon the Union Calendar. In other words, I take it it is claimed that it makes a charge upon the Treasury or entails an obligation upon the Government. The Chair has examined, somewhat hastily, it is true, the bill, but would be glad if the gentleman would point out——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not think it makes any charge upon the Government.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad if the gentleman will point out if he can anything in the bill which makes it subject to the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It authorizes the employment of clerks by one of the Departments of the Government.

The SPEAKER. To what section does the gentleman refer?

Mr. JENKINS. To section 4.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker will notice in line 12, section 4, page 5, the bill provides that the Commissioner may employ such agents and clerks as in his judgment may be necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maine. The language is as follows: "Said Commissioner may employ such agents and clerks as in his judgment may be necessary for properly executing the provisions of this act and shall make an annual report," etc. That is in section 4, page 5. It seems to the Chair that if enacted that would make a charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I suppose that is the fact; I had not in mind that provision of the section, and, of course, I had not anything to do with the Calendar upon which the bill was placed, and my attention was just called at this moment to the particular Calendar upon which it appears. I do not know whether the gentleman desires to insist upon his point of order or not. I do not know that there is any objection to the bill. I will say, so far as the distinguished gentleman from Iowa is concerned, there is an express provision here that this bill does not relate to railroads and does not affect the returns upon the part of railroad companies. Section 8 takes care of it. And I will say further, in relation to the President's message, my understanding of that is that the whole subject of insurance and the Federal control of insurance, and whether you could reach that under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, was given to us under the President's message. Now, this does not relate to an insurance company, it simply relates to corporations that are engaged in interstate commerce. It is true, if an insurance company was engaged in interstate commerce, it might be held to apply to it. But this bill we have acted upon entirely independent of the insurance proposition. It is the purpose of the committee to give a full hearing on that question and later on give the House the benefit of what its conclusion may be in relation thereto, and there is nothing in this bill, I beg to submit, that in any way either interferes with or militates for or against that proposition. Certainly no man on the committee had any such idea in his mind.

Now, this is, of course, an important bill; but it has passed the House once on a yea-and-nay roll call, with only two minority votes. It has had two unanimous reports from the committee. And Mr. Garfield came before the committee during the last session and said that the power vested in him as the Commissioner of Corporations by the legislation creating the Department of Commerce and Labor was simply insufficient and inadequate to accomplish the results that were expected, and that this bill with its provisions was necessary in order to enable him to procure what we are all talking about and all thinking about, namely, the proper degree of publicity on the part of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The bill was submitted to him—I submitted it to him myself—at the last session. His law officers took it and looked it all over, examined it in detail word for word, suggested amendments and changes, every one of which were incorporated in the bill at his suggestion and at his request.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose the Commissioner of Corporations decided that this act applied to insurance companies and demanded that they furnish the information that is provided in this bill and upon refusal of the company then proceeded to test that question in court, might it not be that that would be unconsciously legislating to affect insurance companies?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of course, I will say to the gentleman frankly, if the Commissioner of Corporations undertook to prosecute a company for not complying with this act and the company resisted, on the ground that it was not engaged in interstate commerce, he might raise that question by proceeding under this act.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will permit, the Chair will state that, after all, necessarily these discussions proceed by unanimous consent. Practically this bill ought to be upon the Union Calendar and can not be considered at this time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. After these suggestions I was in hope, Mr. Speaker, that my distinguished friend from California [Mr. NEEDHAM] and my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would withdraw their objections and let the House act upon it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I do not care any further to object to its consideration. I simply wanted to enter my protest against the usurpative zeal of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I hope the gentleman will include the whole of the committee in the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that unanimous consent can be asked on the call of the committees?

The SPEAKER. If they are recognized, they could ask unanimous consent to bring in an elephant.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when the bill was first read, and before the reading was finished, I was looking for some point in the bill to make upon it, thinking that it covered common carriers——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And contravened not only the provisions of the existing law about making reports, but was directly contrary to the provisions of the pending bill which is set for hearing to-morrow. But it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], after having called attention of the House to this bill, might properly let it go over for consideration. There are plenty of people here who may wish to consider whether every grocery store, every private corporation in the land, shall be required to make reports to the Commissioner of Corporations.

Under this bill every kind of a corporation in a large city or small town which engages in any kind of business——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Interstate commerce.

Mr. MANN. Every corporation engages in the interstate commerce of the country, of course, at some time or other, and will be required to make a report. I think that the gentleman ought to give us an opportunity to consider that phase of the bill without asking unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the Chair will indulge me just a moment, I think perhaps I can satisfy the gentleman upon that point. The gentleman will find the bill is very carefully drawn in all of these particulars. It is true that it would require every corporation engaged in interstate commerce to make a report, but it also provides that where one return is once made further returns, when the return would simply be a duplication of the one already made, are not required. So that simply one return would take care of every small corporation, and in an ordinary corporation they can comply with this provision in half an hour's time. It was difficult to tell where to draw the line, and this provision as to duplication practically takes care of that.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will allow me. Take an ordinary corporation engaged in practically private business in competition with a partnership or individual. They do not make a return to the Government and publish their business, and I do not see how even under the terms you name they can exempt themselves from making the annual report. They make reports on their business.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD (reading)—

So far as any return may be a duplicate of one already filed hereunder, the fact may be stated, and the details which are in such case duplicates need not be repeated. Upon its being made to appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that without fault on its part it is impracticable for such corporation to furnish any of the items aforesaid, it may by a written order of the Commissioner be excused from furnishing any such item or items.

Now, the return required here is confined to the items specified. We authorize the Commissioner to require a return made of specific things, and it is practically agreed on the part of all who have investigated that these things are of such a character that they do not disclose the business or involve the amount of business that would embarrass a corporation with its competitors. We simply require it to disclose the financial condition of the corporation, so that people can intelligently judge of the value of the stock and bonds that it is floating.

Mr. MANN. Is there any check on people interested on what the value of the private corporation is?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There might be in large corporations who are undertaking to inflate their stock and sell it.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman on the purpose of the bill, but the question with me is as to whether it is safeguarded sufficiently. Some of us may have to answer an outraged people upon the subject. I have had in the past a good many protests from my city against legislation of this kind which would affect corporations engaged in ordinary wholesale and retail business in the city of Chicago in competition with private partnerships and private individuals. Whether you reach them or not in this bill no one in the United States except the committee knows, and I do not know whether the gentleman is prepared to say.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will answer, so far as I can, every question that the gentleman may ask with relation to the bill. I will do the best I can.

Mr. MANN. Does it cover these corporations?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It covers any corporation engaged in interstate commerce, large or small.

Mr. MANN. What does the return cover? Take a case with which we are all familiar, that of the old house of A. T. Stewart & Co., formerly engaged in the wholesale business in New York City. There is no harm in referring to them now, because they are out of business.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say frankly to the gentleman from Illinois that if I should attempt to state what the corporation is required to report I would have to read practically the first section of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that he ought, then, to let the bill lie over, so that the rest of us can read it, too?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I certainly have no disposition to force the question unduly upon the House, but the gentleman appreciates the situation. This is the first time a call of the committees has reached the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman is not calling this up on the call of committees. That is out of the question. He is calling it up by unanimous consent.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But I am only on my feet because the call of committees has reached the Committee on the Judiciary. Unless we get unanimous consent, of course, we can not proceed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The bill will be referred to the Union Calendar.

APPEALS IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the bill (H. R. 12843) to amend the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the seventh section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That where, upon a hearing in equity in a district or circuit court, or by a judge thereof in vacation, an injunction shall be granted or continued, or a receiver appointed by an interlocutory order or decree, in any cause an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing such injunction, or appointing such receiver, to the circuit court of appeals: Provided, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court; and the proceedings in other respects in the court below shall not be stayed unless otherwise ordered by that court, or by the appellate court, or a judge thereof, during the pendency of such appeal: Provided further, That the court below may, in its discretion, require as a condition of the appeal an additional bond."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin the purpose of this bill. In what respect does it modify the law?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] to answer that question.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill enlarges the jurisdiction of the circuit court of appeals over interlocutory orders granting injunctions and appointing receivers. The court of appeals now has jurisdiction over interlocutory orders granting injunctions and appointing receivers, but is limited in such jurisdiction to interlocutory orders in cases where on final decree in the district or circuit court the circuit court of appeals has jurisdiction. Now, there are certain classes of cases involving constitutional questions that on final decree in the district court can not go to the circuit court of appeals, but must go to the Supreme Court of the United States. We do not intend to change the jurisdiction on final decree at all, but we simply propose by this bill to say that the circuit court of appeals may have jurisdiction over all interlocutory orders granting injunctions and appointing receivers. It is a change that has been demanded by the bar in many instances. At present it is possible and has been the practice sometimes to insert a fake constitutional question into a bill that really has no relation to the merits of the case, and when an interlocutory order granting an injunction has been had in such a case there is absolutely no appeal from it until the case reaches the Supreme Court of the United States on final decree, and the appeal is then of no value. The bill is most meritorious. It was unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress and passed the House, and has been again unanimously reported.

Mr. JAMES. Is the judgment of the circuit court of appeals made final on an appeal from an interlocutory order in the district court?

Mr. BRANTLEY. The same finality that now exists from any other interlocutory order will exist under this bill. We do not change the law in that respect at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and moves to lay that motion on the table. If there be no objection, the latter motion will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

RECOVERY OF VALUE OF UNLAWFUL REBATES.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 11784) to authorize the recovery of the value of unlawful rebates and discriminations, and penalty therefor, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person, company, partnership, association, or corporation that shall, directly or indirectly, receive from any common carrier any benefit or advantage by any unlawful rebate, concession, preference, gratuity, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce shall be liable to pay to the United States the value of every such benefit or advantage, to be recovered, with costs, in an action at law to be brought in the name of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. That any person, company, partnership, association, or corporation that, directly or indirectly, shall knowingly receive from any common carrier any benefit or advantage by any unlawful rebate, concession, preference, gratuity, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce shall be liable to pay to the United States double the value of such benefit or advantage, to be recovered, with costs, in an action at law to be brought in the name of the United States in any circuit court; and if in any such action under this section it shall be found that such benefit or advantage was received, but not that it was received knowingly, then the United States shall recover in such action the value of such benefit or advantage, with costs, as if such action had been brought under the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That either of the actions above provided for may be instituted by the Attorney-General or, by leave of the court, by any person as informant after notice to the Attorney-General to bring such suit. Such informant shall receive half of any amount that shall be recovered in such suit instituted by him, or by settlement or compromise: Provided, however, That such informant shall not dismiss or settle any such suit without leave of the court, after notice to the Attorney-General and the United States attorney for the district wherein such suit shall be pending; and in case of such notice of application to dismiss, or on notice to such informant by the Attorney-General, in case such informant unduly delays or fails to prosecute such suit, the Attorney-General may be ordered by the court to assume said suit, and said informant shall lose all interest therein upon proper terms as to costs and expenses already incurred by him, to be settled by the court.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be cumulative of all other laws on the subject of unlawful rebates, concessions, preferences, gratuities, or discriminations in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce, and judgment under this act shall not be pleaded in bar of any action under any other statute of the United States against rebates, concessions, preferences, gratuities, or discriminations; and nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies.

The following amendments, recommended by the committee, were read:

In section 2, after the words "in the name of the United States in any" (p. 2, lines 6 and 7), strike out the words "circuit court" and insert the words "court of competent jurisdiction."

In section 4, before the word "remedies" where it first occurs (p. 3, line 13), insert the words "rights or," and in the same section, before the word "remedies" where it occurs at the end of the section, insert the words "rights and."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill, and I would like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], who reported the bill.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of so much consequence that I would not bring it up at the end of the day but that my friend from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has intimated to me that he did not feel that it would interfere with the privileges of his committee. I want, of course, to give every Member of the House an opportunity, if he thinks best, to debate so important a measure, and if it be requested I probably shall not object to its going over to some other day. But I welcome the opportunity now to explain this measure to the House.

As long ago as 1900, when the Judiciary Committee were dealing with the subject of trusts, it was reported to this House in minority views that the important matter in preventing trusts and monopolies was to prevent rebates and redress them by providing that any man who should receive an unlawful rebate should have to give up its value. In 1903 a majority of the Judiciary Committee, when another bill to prevent unlawful combinations was before that committee, united in the belief that this was the proper remedy, and all that prevented that majority from reporting favorably on the measure was difference of opinion as to its form. Some wanted the value of the rebate to be recovered, some wanted double that value to be recovered, and some wanted to allow suit to be brought not only by the Attorney-General, but also by an informer, and because of those three views the measure then failed.

The committee have now come to a substantially unanimous agreement. Two or three members of the committee are doubtful, but there is no minority report. We believe that the value of any benefit or advantage, whether it be by preference, concession, or discrimination of any kind, which is received by any man from a common carrier, and in which the public has no share, should be given up, and the first question is, to whom? Is it to go back to the railroad or common carrier? That was the first suggestion. Ought the railroad or common carrier to receive back the value of the preference which they have unlawfully given? Much might be said for that view, for it would be recovered by a simple action, as if for value had and received. But the difficulty is that the very railroad who gave the rebate, secret or otherwise, has thereby received the valuable patronage of enormous customers and obtained benefits which did not belong to that railroad, and it would be clearly inequitable and unjust that it should be paid money in addition for breaking the law. What is more, no suit authorized by that railroad would probably be brought in good faith. The railroad is certainly not the party injured. Nor are the persons injured merely those that were in competition, for very few dare to be in competition with the great trusts. Those who are injured are those who are kept out of competition, the great public; it is the great public that has paid more for the article manufactured by monopolies, and it is therefore not only necessary to have the public be the plaintiff, but it is right that the public which has been wronged should have the remedy.

Now, the novelty of this bill lies in two directions: First, in the fact that it is a remedy by civil suit on the civil side of the court and not a remedy on the criminal side; and secondly, that it is not a prosecution involving a mere fine of a few thousand dollars, but a suit for the whole value of the concession, which may amount to millions in a year. A suit on the civil side of the court has a preference over those upon the criminal side. It is governed by different rules. Witnesses can not refuse to testify. Books can not be kept back. What is more, the party who received the preference, in some cases, will insist that it was fair and that he took it honestly, while his rival insists that he has received an unlawful rebate, and under those circumstances the bill gives an opportunity for a trial before the court and a jury of a fairly disputed question—for example, whether discrimination has been made between men residing in neighboring towns, or perhaps whether a man that owns a switch or sidetrack has received unlawful advantages for the use of that sidetrack. We hope that in many cases suits brought under the first section for the simple value of the rebate with costs will enable such a question to be determined, not by a Government officer or a bureaucratic department, but by the action of court and jury—to determine in law and fact whether different rates have been charged or different privileges allowed in cases where the services performed were substantially the same, but without attacking any man's motives.

If, then, a verdict be recovered, the defendant gives up no more than what he has unlawfully received. But when judgment has been rendered the foundation is laid, if he and the common carrier persist in the unlawful course, for alleging that that course has been decreed to be unlawful, that the violation is willful, and for suit to be brought thereafter for double the value as by way of penalty under the second section.

The second distinction, as I have said, is in the amount of recovery.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not familiar enough with the bill, and I would like to know whether or not there is any limitation fixed in the bill with reference to the time that these suits may be brought to recover back?

Mr. PARKER. They are only for future violations. No bill would be constitutional that touched the past.

Mr. KEIFER. Then, as I understand, if the gentleman will allow me, this is in the nature of a regulation of interstate commerce by a prohibition against the payment of rebates, and the penalty is the right of the Government to recover back the rebate.

Mr. PARKER. This bill does not regulate commerce. Regulations are established by statutes reported and passed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, acts which are cited in the report prohibiting unjust discrimination. There is no remedy in this bill against the carrier. What this bill says is that where the beneficiary—that is to say, the shipper—receives an unlawful rebates, declared to be unlawful by the interstate-commerce acts, he shall be liable to give up its value, and double that value if it be done willfully—that is, knowingly.

Mr. KEIFER. If the bill does not regulate interstate commerce, how do we get the constitutional power to simply pass an act that is penal in its character?

Mr. PARKER. It is based upon acts already existing which do regulate commerce and which make it unlawful for any man to receive preferences over another man, and then this bill says that if he shall have received such a preference, its value shall not stay in his pocket, but shall be reclaimed and taken.

Mr. KEIFER. One question further. I am not, as I said, familiar with the language of the bill. Does the bill provide that the rebate must be paid in violation of existing law, or does it apply generally to any rebate?

Mr. PARKER. Only to unlawful rebate—rebate in violation of law now existing or hereafter to be passed.

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are rebates that do not come within the simple and innocent class that I have mentioned. There are rebates that are secret, money repaid, passes given to the shipper, various advantages given to him, gifts made to his family, secret changes of schedules of which he alone gets notice, so that he is able to buy up the market and monopolize—such rebates are given in some twenty different forms.

Those rebates, given knowingly and secretly, are certainly given willfully. A few of them only can be discovered. In such cases, as well as in the case where the rebate has already been adjudged to be unlawful by a decision of the court to which the shipper was a party—in such cases the second section rightly applies, by which a suit is brought for double the value, and it is to such instances that I think the President refers in his late message, in which, on page 6 of our copy, he says:

It is worth while considering whether it would not be wise to confer on the Government the right of civil action against the beneficiary of a rebate for at least twice the value of the rebate; this would help stop what is really blackmail.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. Could the gentleman wait a moment?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes; two moments.

Mr. PARKER. Just a moment. The third section of the bill is directed to a more difficult question, whether the suit should be only by the Attorney-General or whether to allow process by an informer acting as plaintiff in the name of the United States and sharing the recovery. My own impression, after some doubt, is that the provisions of the bill are sufficiently guarded in that respect. There may be cases in which the Attorney-General might not feel like putting the whole power of the Government in force simply to discuss a question as between two different towns, we will say, as to whether a published rate was right or wrong, and to assume the expense of such a suit.

In such an instance the Attorney-General might tell the complaining parties to try it themselves. The court might say—for the leave of the court is necessary by the bill to the bringing of such a suit—that it is a fair thing that the manufacturer in one town should have a suit in that court to determine against manufacturers in a neighboring town, whether the rates be fair, and bid him come in and try the case, only remembering—for so the bill provides—that he shall not settle that suit without the leave of the court, and that before settling or discontinuing it he must get such leave of the court after notice to the Attorney-General.

The bill likewise provides, in order to prevent fictitious actions, that if any informer bring such a suit and unduly delay it or fail to prosecute, the Attorney-General can apply to the court to be substituted, and may proceed to prosecute the suit to a conclusion. This is, therefore, not the ordinary provision for information by a private party. It is one in which the courts are given full power to adjust, arrange, and control the suit.

The fourth section of the bill provides that this act shall not interfere with any existing laws, but is in addition to the provisions of such laws and subject to them, providing a civil remedy, just as one whose property has been stolen can recover it, or as the Government may prosecute a smuggler or pirate and can likewise conduct proceedings of condemnation against the smuggled goods or the pirate vessel. This bill provides a proceeding against whatever is unlawfully in the hands of those who shall take it wrongfully. That proceeding goes directly for the corpus delicti. It insists on restoring the equality that has been infringed. It should be more efficient than any other remedy for the protection of fair competition, the prevention of monopolies, and the redress of the inequality caused by unjust privileges given to one which are withheld from others, and which are unlawful by express statute. I see it is getting near the usual hour of adjournment, and while I have welcomed the opportunity to call up this bill, if any gentleman here wishes to discuss it, so that it would be likely to go over until another day, I am very glad to answer questions, but should prefer not to attempt to hold the House against its will, but to ask its leave to hold the bill and its discussion as unfinished business. One or two gentlemen wished to ask questions.

Mr. McMORRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. McMORRAN. I understood the theory of your bill is there must be an informer in order to correct——

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

Mr. McMORRAN. Suppose I am a shipper and I think my competitor is getting rebates from a railway. Now, how am I going to show it unless I get an informer?

Mr. PARKER. You can go to the Attorney-General and ask him to bring suit. If he will not bring suit you can apply to the court for leave to bring suit as informant or prosecutor after giving notice to the Attorney-General, and if the court thinks it right that suit should be brought it may be brought, but it still remains within the control of the court.

Mr. McMORRAN. Yes; but I may have the best of reasons to believe my competitor is receiving rebates yet I have not positive proof. Now, have I the right under the bill to insist upon the railways producing their books and verifying my suspicions?

Mr. PARKER. You have only the right which belongs to every one to subpœna witnesses to bring testimony into court.

Mr. McMORRAN. Regardless of the fact whether I have any facts to start upon or not?

Mr. PARKER. That is all you can do in any case.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. At the bottom of page 7 of your report I see this:

In such an action the defendant can not plead the purity of his intent or refuse to testify for fear of criminating himself, or do anything except to ask a fair trial of the question whether his contract privileges or freight rates are valid under the law of the land.

Now, if it is a suit to recover rebates unlawfully paid or received, why would he not criminate himself if he was compelled to testify as to the fact of doing an unlawful thing which is penalized both before the Elkins Act and by the Elkins Act? In other words, it is as much a crime for the shipper or corporation or railroad to give rebates now as it was before the Elkins Act removed the imprisonment for it, and they are fined $20,000, and there you say the person can be compelled to testify without fear of criminating himself. How would that be true?

If the person that testifies is compelled to testify, and from his testimony the fact is developed that he has violated the criminal law of the land, you make him testify even in a civil suit?

Mr. PARKER. This bill provides for suit against the shipper, while most of the criminal penalties are imposed upon the railroad or its agents, and the only section which creates a penalty as to the shipper is very carefully drawn, so as to require intention to be proved. It will be found in the Elkins Act. No man can read that section through carefully without seeing that it is directed against the intentional receipt or solicitation of rebates and that the penal or criminal part of the act applies only to such willful receipt of rebates, and if you had been shipping on a railroad——

Mr. BARTLETT. All crimes have intentions in them, of course.

Mr. PARKER. If you had been shipping on a railroad—we will suppose you controlled a business of many millions of dollars—and that thereupon you went to the railroad agents and simply said that you wanted a good rate; that you had been talking to agents of the other railroad and that they offered certain terms.

In this case, if you were offered better terms and accepted, not having looked at the law or compared the published rates, no jury in the world would ever convict you of criminal intent or crime under any of those acts. But, on the other hand, if the suit be under this bill for the simple value of the rebate, then if you want to protect yourself you will come right into court and say that you did not intend anything wrong, explain what you did, and ask a decision whether it be fair and legal or not. Then the court and jury will determine whether it be fair or whether it be unfair and unlawful. And in this suit the defendant can not plead that his intent was good. The question is not whether that intent was good or not, but whether he has been receiving from a common carrier advantages which do not belong to him under the published rates.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does this bill provide that testimony given under compulsory process shall not be used in any criminal prosecution?

Mr. PARKER. The committee would not put that in. That is a question for the House. The opinion of the committee was that this proceeding ought to be additional to all others.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then, under the law as it stands, if witnesses are compelled to give testimony, they have no protection against the use of that testimony in criminal prosecutions under other statutes against rebates?

Mr. PARKER. Except the great practical protection under which a witness who comes in and tells all he knows never is prosecuted.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no legal protection, then?

Mr. PARKER. None at all; but a great practical protection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does not the gentleman think it would be a better safeguard against abuses if the bill were amended so as to provide that evidence given in this class of cases should not be used against a witness in any criminal prosecution?

Mr. PARKER. I do not think so. I think that that would be an interference with the interstate-commerce provisions with reference to the penal laws, and at the same time this question will be within the jurisdiction of the House when the bill comes before it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My judgment is that in courts trying this class of cases, if a witness makes objection that he can not answer a question without incriminating himself, the court will decide he can not be compelled to answer the question, because there is no protection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] yield for a suggestion? I want to suggest to the gentleman that it is perfectly evident that the bill can not pass to-night. There seems to be considerable opposition to it, and the attendance is slim now.

Mr. PARKER. Is there objection to it? Does anybody prefer any other explanation of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say to the gentleman that I want to get some light from him on two or three points in the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I will make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, we have one or two other matters that we would like to dispose of to-night.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like unanimous consent that this particular bill should be considered as unfinished business.

Mr. JENKINS. It is unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] asks unanimous consent that this may be considered as unfinished business in the House? Is there objection?

A MEMBER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PROSECUTIONS BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I desire to call up House resolution No. 117. I want to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I do it because the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who introduced the resolution, is here. It will take but a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that privileged resolution, I want to ask unanimous consent of the House——

The SPEAKER. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the House whether any criminal prosecutions have been instituted by the Department of Justice against the individuals or corporations who were adjudged recently by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Northern Securities case, to be guilty of having violated the laws of the United States by entering into unlawful combinations in restraint of interstate commerce.

Also the following committee amendments:

Amend after the word "not," in the first line, and before the word "incompatible," in the second line, by inserting the words "in his judgment."

And further amend by striking out after the word "commerce," in lines 8 and 9, all of the remainder of the line 9 and lines 10 and 11.

RECOVERY OF VALUE OF UNLAWFUL REBATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill preceding this matter, to which the gentleman from New Jersey addressed himself, by unanimous consent will go over as unfinished business until another call of committees is reached.

Mr. MANN. What is the request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Otherwise this resolution can not now be taken up, without some action on the part of the House, either postponing this bill or by unanimous consent abandoning it for the present, in which abandonment it would be unfinished when this order of business is reached again.

Mr. MANN. Well, it does not require unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is referring to the Parker bill. The Chair hears no objection.

PROSECUTIONS BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask unanimous consent, instead of addressing myself to this resolution this evening, to have time granted me to do so at some future time to be agreed upon by the Speaker and myself—the same length of time that I would be entitled to now.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no objection to the resolution, but it seems to me that we ought to have the benefit of the discussion before we vote upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution for information. It is, of course, as the gentleman knows, privileged, and I do not know whether I will want to talk about it or not. Perhaps he may send the information to the House. He may give it in such a way that there will be nothing for me to discuss. I will probably be saving the time of the House. If, for example, he would send information that they had inaugurated prosecutions, that is all I want; all I want the country to know. Of course the resolution carries with it its privileged character. But this unanimous consent that I ask merely is to the effect that the House shall allow me at any future time to talk about it instead of talking about it now.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the most liberal debate if the House has time, but I am not willing to consent that at some time in the future some gentleman shall make a speech on a subject not then before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin will then, if he consents, withhold the resolution and introduce it another time when the House has more time. I do not want to trespass on the time of the House now. I may not want to do it at all. I do not see why unanimous consent can not now be granted.

Mr. JAMES. If you only do that, you do it by permission of the Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. What is to prevent the gentleman asking unanimous consent at any time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But after the resolution is introduced it will then have lost its privileged character and I will be at the mercy of the objector.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, to save time I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Rialto Orange-Lemon Association, of Rialto, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Brightwood Citizens' Association, of Brightwood, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to authorize the Baltimore and Washington Transit Company of Maryland to extend its street railway into the District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. Some days since I introduced a bill for the relief of A. W. Tedcastle, guardian of Frances L. Snell, which was referred to the Committee on Claims in due course. With it I filed certain papers, which is customary. An additional paper came in, which I sent up to the Committee on Claims to be filed with the bill. I was there informed that under the rule—a rule of which I had no knowledge whatever—it was necessary to present such papers in the Senate. It seems to me to be a useless regulation, but if that is the rule I now present the paper to be referred to the Committee on Claims, to be filed with Senate bill 3421.

Mr. KEAN. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have been a member of the Committee on Claims for some years, and I never knew such a rule to be made.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I sent the paper up yesterday, and was informed at the committee room that by an order of the Secretary of the Senate, acting under a rule, as I suppose, it had to be presented in the Senate. It was something entirely new to me. I had supposed that papers could be sent to the committee.

Mr. KEAN. It is entirely new to me also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Claims as requested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

RETURN OF RECORDS TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SIMMONS. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 26) providing for the return of certain archives now in possession of the Department of State to the State of North Carolina was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the joint resolution be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the files of the Department of State, and deliver to the State of North Carolina, certain legislative papers, correspondence, and other material appertaining to the records of said State and not needed for the use of the Department of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire in this connection to read an extract from a letter received by me this morning from the Secretary of State in regard to these papers:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 29, 1906.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 23d instant, I have the honor to inform you that this Department can see no objection to returning to the State of North Carolina certain legislative papers and other material relating to the records of said State, now in its possession; but that the authority of Congress will be necessary before the removal can be effected.

Mr. KEAN. We can not hear the Senator on this side.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber from the Senator from North Carolina are unable to hear him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just read a letter from the Secretary of State, in which he says that there can be no objection to the return of these records.

Mr. KEAN. I think the joint resolution had better go to the Committee on the Library. I have no objection to it, but I think it had better be referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I suggest that it ought to be in the form of a concurrent resolution. If a concurrent resolution, the resolving clause would be, "Resolved by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring." I make that suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I introduced it in the form of a joint resolution because in the letter of the Secretary of State the part which I did not read says:

I inclose a draft of a joint resolution usual in such cases.

I am not familiar with the practice about that, and I deferred to the opinion of the Secretary of State.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that a joint resolution has to take the same course as a bill and have Executive approval. If the resolution were in a concurrent form it would only require the vote of the two Houses.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina to let us know how the archives or records got into the possession of the State Department.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no information as to how the records of the State of North Carolina got into the State Department, but I presume that at the close of the war they were taken by the Federal forces, which had possession of the capital of my State for a short time, and transported to the capital of the country. I presume that is the way they came into the possession of the Department.

These records are very important to my State at this time, because we are having compiled by the chief justice of the State the records of the State. These papers are very material, as will appear from a brief I have, furnished me by the chief of the bureau in which the records are deposited. They are—

Letters and petitions to the governor and the legislature.
Papers, letters, and accounts of the agency for settling North Carolina accounts with the United States.
Legislative papers.
Estimates of allowances for members and clerks of the council of State and of the legislature.
Reports of committees.
Letters from Delegates to Continental Congress, including copies of resolves of Congress.
Letters from Senators and Representatives, including copies of resolves and acts of Congress.
Militia papers.
Papers relating to administration of justice, extract from court records, indictments, executions, etc.
Journals of council of state.
Papers relating to rebuilding of State capitol.
Miscellaneous papers, forming about one-fourth of the collection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that possibly a concurrent resolution would not reach the purpose and accomplish it. I do not see how a record or anything which is in one of the Departments can be withdrawn by a concurrent resolution. It must necessarily be a joint resolution. A concurrent resolution can only affect something within the immediate control of the two Houses, one or the other of them. A joint resolution is certainly necessary for anything which goes beyond that immediate jurisdiction.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is right in the point he makes. I thought it related to a matter in the custody of Congress.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the resolution, but I think it had better go to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KEAN subsequently said: I wish to withdraw the objection I made to the resolution offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey withdraws his objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from North Carolina. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If no amendment be proposed——

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the resolution ought to leave some discretion in the Secretary of State as to what particular documents shall be transferred to the State of North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg pardon of the Senator. I did not hear his suggestion.

Mr. ALLISON. The resolution provides that the Secretary of State shall be directed to transfer certain documents to the State of North Carolina. It does not state what documents. I should think it wise to leave the discretion in the Secretary of State to transmit such documents as are not needed in the State Department.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Iowa, with his permission, that the Secretary, at the time he wrote me the letter with reference to these documents, stated that there was no objection to transferring them to the State of North Carolina, and I secured from the bureau in which the documents are deposited a memorandum of what they consist of, and that memorandum I read to the Senate a few moments ago.

Mr. ALLISON. I was absent when that was done.

Mr. SIMMONS. I filed that memorandum.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw any objection, upon that statement. I make no further suggestion.

Mr. KEAN. Let the memorandum be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. The memorandum goes into the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. LODGE. Has unanimous consent been given for the consideration of the joint resolution without reference to a committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me it ought to go to a committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection from the Senator from Massachusetts the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. LODGE. It is a resolution to withdraw certain papers from the State Department of which we know nothing, and it seems to me we ought to have the information. It appears to me a pretty serious order to make without any consideration at all except a casual consideration here in the morning hour.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I will read the memorandum showing what these papers are, and I think he will see that they are papers that belong to the files of the State of North Carolina, and have no connection with any of the records of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator how did these papers get into the State Department?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not able to speak positively about that, but just at the close of the war, as the Senator knows, the Federal forces occupied the capital of my State, Raleigh.

Mr. SPOONER. Are these papers a part of the Confederate archives?

Mr. LODGE. These are State papers.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the nature of the record? Are they records of the State made during the war?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think they are records that were in the office of the secretary of state in Raleigh at the time when the Federal forces passed through the State and had possession of the capitol——

Mr. SPOONER. What I want to get at——

Mr. SIMMONS. And they brought these records away.

Mr. SPOONER. Are they ancient papers or are they papers that originated and accumulated during the war? Do they have reference to the transactions of the State?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not state about that; but I think a great many of the papers were accumulated before that time. For instance, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. I suggest that the Senator from North Carolina read the list of papers. That is the best way.

Mr. SIMMONS. Some of the papers are letters from Delegates to the Continental Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. That may fairly be considered ancient.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like, if the Senator will permit me, to read again the memorandum sent me by the Department, which shows the character of all the papers.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the Senator read it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I read it a little while ago.

Mr. SPOONER. I had the misfortune not to be present.

Mr. SIMMONS (reading):

[Department of State, Bureau of Rolls and Library, William McNeir, Chief of Bureau, January 30, 1906. Memorandum of North Carolina archives in the Department of State.]

Following is a brief of the contents of the North Carolina papers referred to in Mr. Leland's letter.

They were called to my attention by a letter of Mr. Leland, which I sent up to the Department.

Letters and petitions to the governor and the legislature.
Papers, letters, and accounts of the agency for settling North Carolina accounts with the United States.
Legislative papers.
Estimates of allowances for members and clerks of the council of state and of the legislature.
Reports of committees.
Letters from Delegates to Continental Congress, including copies of resolves of Congress.
Letters from Senators and Representatives, including copies of resolves and acts of Congress.
Militia papers.
Papers relating to administration of justice, extracts from court records, indictments, executions, etc.
Journals of council of state.
Papers relating to rebuilding of State capitol.
Miscellaneous papers, forming about one-fourth of the collection.

I will state to the Senate that the chief justice of my State has been by an act of the legislature designated to compile the records of the State. He has been engaged in that work for a long time. He discovered in the prosecution of his investigations that a part of the records of the State were missing. He had been searching for them for some time, but was unable, until he received this letter from Mr. Leland, to locate the missing papers. He forwarded that letter to me, and I went to the State Department. I found that the records were there, and I submitted the letter of Mr. Leland and the letter of the chief justice who is engaged in the compilation of our State records, and who wants these records for the purpose of completing this compilation, to the Secretary of State, Mr. Root, and asked whether they could be returned without an act of Congress. He advised me in the letter which I read to the Senate a few moments ago during the absence of the Senator that they can not be returned without an act of Congress, and says that he sees no objection to their return, and he prepared and transmitted to me in that letter the joint resolution which I have introduced.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, if the Senator will permit me, the memorandum which he has read shows to the Senate the nature of some of the papers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of all except the miscellaneous papers.

Mr. SPOONER. Some of the papers have been shown by that memorandum to be ancient documents of no value whatever, of course, except for historical purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that is the purpose we want them for at this time.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, I refer to the papers now which are characterized there as papers of colonial times—papers of the Continental Congress. There are papers there by general description mentioned which may very well remain in the Department of State or some other Department of the Government. There are papers, so far as the general designation in the memorandum is concerned, which would be embraced in what are called the Confederate archives, which are for a good many purposes of great value to the Government. The papers are legislative and executive, which originated during the war. I am opposed to passing a bill here, for it is a bill——

Mr. LODGE. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. A joint resolution is a bill. It requires the approval of the President. We can appropriate money by joint resolution. We can do anything almost by joint resolution that we could do by a bill. It is distinguished in that respect from a concurrent resolution.

I think this matter ought to be referred to a committee, and the Senate ought to know just what papers are embraced in the proposed bill. If there are papers that will be useful to the Government as being a part of the Confederate archives, even though they came from the State as State archives instead of archives of the Confederate government, they ought not to be included.

Mr. SIMMONS. With the Senator's permission, I am sure the Senator knows I do not desire that any papers should be returned to the State of North Carolina which ought properly to remain in the archives of the Government, but I think the Senator will discover from the bill itself that probably a sufficient discretion is left in the Secretary in order to enable him to transmit only those parts of the documents that properly belong to the State of North Carolina and retain the balance. I call the Senator's attention to the language of the joint resolution. It is as follows:

And he is hereby authorized and directed to withdraw from the files of the Department of State and deliver to the State of North Carolina certain legislative papers, correspondence, and other material appertaining to the records of said State and not needed for the use of the Department of State.

I think that clearly vests in the Secretary the discretion of determining what part of these papers ought to go back to North Carolina and what part ought to be retained here because they are needed in the State Department.

Mr. SPOONER. There are records in the State Department that never will be utilized by the State Department as such which ought to be in the State Department, but which are of value in other Departments and of value to the Government. Of course any paper which it is clear never will be of utility to the Government and is historical in its nature ought to be permitted to go back to the State of North Carolina, but there should be, I think, some much more definite information about the papers.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that I am perfectly willing to accept any amendment he may wish to offer that will confine——

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over until to-morrow and see if we can not agree upon some amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. I will say to the Senator that if it goes over until to-morrow perhaps we can agree upon an amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. As some question has been raised as to what part of the records ought to be returned to the State of North Carolina, I have no serious objection to its going over until to-morrow and going to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is a very bad practice to pass bills and joint resolutions without reference to a committee. I think it is a very bad practice to enter upon. If there is no objection to the joint resolution, it can be reported back within twenty-four hours after its reference. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment providing for the establishment of a United States consulate at Calgary, Canada, and proposing to appropriate $1,500 therefor, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. HILDRETH.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, pursuant to a resolution yesterday passed by the Senate the House of Representatives has returned a certain bill, which is now on the table of the Senate, which I ask to have the Chair lay before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution from the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, in accordance with its request, the bill (H. R. 1330) granting an increase of pension to William A. Hildreth.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered, the beneficiary having died, and that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill referred to was passed be reconsidered, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for a reprint of Senate Report No. 8, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, being the report to accompany the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes. It is a matter of eight or nine lines. I do not know why it is desired to have it reprinted, but I have been asked to have it done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 300 copies of Senate Report No. 8, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, "Manufacture, sale, etc., of adulterated foods, etc.," be printed.

COURTS-MARTIAL OF MIDSHIPMEN.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of the records and the evidence in full made and produced in the courts-martial recently held at the Naval Academy in the cases of Midshipmen Pettersen B. Marzoni and Claude B. Mayo, charged with hazing, together with a statement of the final action taken by the Navy Department in said cases; and to also inform the Senate under and in accordance with what law or laws said courts-martial were convened, their proceedings conducted, and final action in said cases taken.

CEDAR POINT AND DAUPHIN ISLAND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1747) to authorize the Mobile Railway and Dock Company to construct and maintain a bridge or viaduct across the water between the end of Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, which was, on page 3, line 22, to strike out the words "and change" and insert "or remove."

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILLS.

Mr. DANIEL. I inquire whether the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] for the discharge of the Committee on Interstate Commerce from what are known as the "employers' liability bills" has been laid before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not yet been laid before the Senate, but will be when in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I inquire if the routine morning business has been concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The routine morning business has not been closed. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Colorado will withhold for a moment, the Chair will lay before the Senate the request of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], coming over from yesterday, that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying documents. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I do not see in the Chamber the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I observe the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is present. I have looked into the RECORD with respect to the disposition of the bills referred to at the last session and at the present session of the Senate, and I find that in the Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] introduced Senate bill 4092, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On March 7, 1904, Senator Hoar, from the Committee on the Judiciary (see vol. 38, pt. 3, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2906), asked that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; which was agreed to.

In the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] introduced Senate bill 1657, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] introduced Senate bill 156, which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply ask that we may have order in the Chamber, as it is impossible to hear what is being said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ELKINS. The two bills I have named are those which are covered by the motion I made yesterday under instructions from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, that they be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question that is raised in these bills is covered in the resolution authorizing sessions of the Interstate Commerce Committee during the recess of the Senate. That question came up also in connection with these two bills, and the committee authorized the chairman to report that they had considered the subject and felt that it belonged rather to the Committee on the Judiciary than to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Therefore it was that I made the motion yesterday that is now before the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, there are two bills involved in this motion. One was offered by myself on December 6, 1905, and the other a little later by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is impossible for us to hear, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DANIEL. As I have said, the other bill was introduced a little later——

Mr. TELLER. I think we ought to have order enough to be able to hear what is going on. Nobody on this side of the Chamber heard the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and I doubt whether anybody on the other side can hear the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I think we had better have order established before the Senator from Virginia proceeds.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] involves two bills. One was offered by myself on December 6, 1905, and the other by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on December 14. Both of them, however, involve the same principle as a previous bill offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, with some variations. They relate to the subject-matter of the liability of common carriers, of railroads in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, and as to that liability affecting their employees. The principle of the bill is that the carrier shall not be excused from negligence on account of the fellow-service of employees. That principle has been put into the constitution of the State of Virginia and has been adopted by the legislatures of many States. This is not the time to discuss it, nor do I propose to bring up the merits of either of those bills, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a proposition of this general nature has been pending in this body for over four years, and that as yet no committee has made a report upon it. It first appeared on December 8, 1902, during the Fifty-seventh Congress, in a bill introduced by the present senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and there disappeared.

On February 3, 1904, the Senator from Pennsylvania offered a bill of the same general nature, which was also referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. This was in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

On March 7 of that year the then senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, who was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that bill to the Senate and asked that that committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. This was agreed to. The bill at that session went to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which made no report.

In 1905 when the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported a resolution authorizing that committee to sit in vacation and to consider additional legislation on the interstate-commerce law, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] offered an amendment, which I will read:

And also to consider what legislation should be enacted in relation to the liability of railroad companies engaged in interstate traffic or operating lines in any Territory of the United States for injuries received by their employees when in the discharge of duty.

This resolution was considered, amended, agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

During the vacation of the last session I think this matter was taken under consideration by that committee in connection with other matters. On December 14 of the present session the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who has made this motion, reported that:

Under the terms of the resolution the committee was required to report in ten days after the beginning of the present session of the Senate by bill or otherwise. While the committee can not report a bill to-day, I am authorized to state to the Senate, on behalf of the committee, that it went into session on the 21st of November and has been holding meetings, not every day since, but as often as it suited the convenience of the members, to consider the various and difficult subjects raised in the resolution that was adopted by the Senate.

He concluded by saying:

It is the belief of the members of the committee that later on it will be able to report a bill to the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. President, I am not criticising the Senator from West Virginia, but I simply wish to fix the attention of the Senate upon the fact that a procedure in the nature of a game of battledoor and shuttlecock has progressed in this body for now four years; and that, with no report on this measure, it now hangs fire again in the Senate, the committee to which it has been referred from year to year declining to make any report upon it.

I am well aware, Mr. President, that that committee has had some of the gravest questions of the age under consideration; but at the same time the question involved in this separate measure is a matter which has been discussed for a decade or more in the United States, and the learning of it fills the judicial reports and the literature of the law. The principle is very simple, and a very few hours would enable any man to collate the substance of this learning and to determine which way he stood, one side or the other, on this question.

There is now no legislation on this subject in the districts and Territories over which the United States has sole jurisdiction. All that I am seeking now is to get action on this bill, and have it brought before the Senate, so that this body shall determine whether or not it desires to embody it into law. The Interstate Commerce Committee does not want it; the Judiciary Committee has twice had it—once affirmatively shelved it as an overcoat that they did not wish to wear, and the other time said nothing about it.

I move, Mr. President, if it be in order to do so at this juncture, that this bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is pending a motion to refer, and the Senator's motion is not in order.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DANIEL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not aware until a moment ago to what the Senator was addressing himself, having been otherwise occupied.

Mr. DANIEL. It was with reference to the common carriers' liability bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I am a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, as the Senator knows, and I am also a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. I have no objection to considering these bills in either of those committees, and I do not think there is any objection to the consideration of them by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. KEAN. None whatever.

Mr. FORAKER. I am certainly quite willing to take up the bills for consideration at any time.

In the Committee on Interstate Commerce we have been, as the Senator well knows, very busily occupied with the general railway-rate legislation proposition that has been referred to us for consideration. I do not think the request that these bills be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary was due to any lack of disposition on the part of the Interstate Commerce Committee to consider these particular bills. I know it was not so far as I am concerned.

I might say more than that. I think attention was not particularly called to the bills at the time when this action was taken. I was otherwise engaged in the committee. I do not know how the other members of the committee feel, but I am quite sure that if these bills be left with the Interstate Commerce Committee or be sent to the Judiciary Committee they will receive attention. I know they will so far as I am concerned, and I have not heard of any member of either committee expressing any disposition not to give them consideration.

I think the bills ought to go to the Judiciary Committee because of the important legal questions involved, or else they should remain with the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr ELKINS].

Mr. DANIEL. I move to strike out "Committee on the Judiciary" and insert "Committee on Education and Labor" in the matter of reference. I suppose that motion is in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. If I am not mistaken, Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is this: The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce asked unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of this subject, and that the bills be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think he made no motion at all upon the subject. It was a request for unanimous consent by the Senator from West Virginia, and that is not a motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia yesterday stated:

Mr. ELKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 156 and Senate bill 1657, two bills on the same subject, and which are alike, and to ask that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the accompanying documents.

The Chair understood this to be in effect a motion, and distinctly stated it to the Senate as a motion.

Mr. DANIEL. That is right.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think the ordinary course of procedure in similar cases has been that unanimous consent has been asked. Such suggestions are usually made at a time when a motion would not be strictly in order. That has been the usual course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that under Rule XXVI a motion to discharge a committee from the further consideration of a specific subject must be considered as an independent proposition, and before considering the reference to another committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes; a motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. But it is not the intention, I am sure, of the committee, and I imagine it was not the intention of the chairman of the committee to make a motion to that effect, but simply to ask the Senate by unanimous consent to have this change of reference made. Of course that can only be done by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there should be objection to a request for unanimous consent, a motion would be in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator chose to make the motion; yes. But if he did not, I assume it would be entirely within his control.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I made objection yesterday to the unanimous consent asked for by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and the matter went over until to-day. As I understand, it is now open to such a motion as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has made. Unanimous consent was not granted. The matter is now taken from the table for consideration, and any motion that any Senator chooses to make is applicable.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want to add, if the Senator from Virginia will indulge me to that extent——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no desire to keep these bills from the Interstate Commerce Committee or the Committee on the Judiciary. I only want to say for myself that there has been no attempt to avoid consideration of the bills, so far as I am aware. The bills were never brought up for consideration in the Interstate Commerce Committee, and if they were considered by the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress I naturally know nothing about it, because I was not then a member of that committee. If the Senate sees fit to leave the bills with the Interstate Commerce Committee I am quite sure they will receive consideration. If it is agreed to take them away from that committee, so far as I am concerned, I shall be very happy, because we are not looking for more work.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The question of order which I desire to make is, as I understand, first, the motion—if it is to be a matter of motion—I do not know whether or not a motion was made to discharge the committee——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would ask the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to kindly state whether he made a motion or a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ELKINS. What I made was in the nature of a request. I asked unanimous consent that the committee be discharged. I did not feel at liberty to make a motion, and I did not make a motion. It was a report to the Senate, under the order of business as called by the Presiding Officer, and under the order of reports of committees I reported that I was authorized to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bills.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, the point of order I make is that no motion has yet been made, and that, if such a motion is made, it must lie over under the rule.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me, I will inform him that the motion was made on yesterday, and that it has lain over a day under the rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to make an additional suggestion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it was a motion to refer, that motion is not amendable under the Senate rules.

Mr. LODGE. But my point of order was that the motion to discharge the committee must in any event, whether considered to-day or to-morrow, be first decided.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct. The motion to discharge the committee must be first decided.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me a word?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask the Senator a question while he is on his feet, and then I will yield the floor. Does the Senator think, if these bills were referred back to the Interstate Commerce Committee, that a report could be made upon them in twenty or thirty days?

Mr. ELKINS. I can hardly say. We have had the subject under consideration and took testimony in the hearings held during the recess. I can not say that within twenty or thirty days we can bring in a general bill on the rate question, but I think in that time we may be able to do so. Now, will the Senator, before he proceeds further, allow me to make a further statement?

Mr. President, the subject-matter of these two bills is a judicial question. The committee so considered it. Here is a bill to establish the carrier's liability for a fellow-servant's negligence. Railroads are now incorporated in the States. Jurisdiction in these cases is sought under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution where railroads are engaged in interstate traffic. There is a nice distinction as to whether the action in one of the cases should be brought in a State court or in a Federal court. This is an attempt to establish such liability on the part of the carrier, and, under the law it is proposed to pass, to put these causes in the Federal courts.

That distinction is what moved those members of the committee who were present unanimously to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, in order that the underlying judicial question might be first determined.

There was no disposition in the committee, nor is there now, to avoid the consideration of this question if it is the judgment of the Senate that the Interstate Commerce Committee is the proper committee to take up and consider it.

It was considered to some extent at the last session. I am not authorized to state what happened in committee. It would not be proper for me to tell here what happened. As I say, it was to some extent considered then. It was considered during the vacation, and it has been considered at this session. For the reason I have stated, that we thought and still think the question whether such an action should lie in a State court or in a Federal court ought to be disposed of by the Judiciary Committee, and for that reason only, I asked that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. But if there is any disposition on the part of the Senate, or if it is the judgment of the Senate that this question should be left with the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I assure the Senate it will have prompt consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, when this question came up before the Interstate Commerce Committee I did not object to the motion to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee, but I did not then know that the bill had prior to that time been before the Judiciary Committee and that that committee had recommended that it be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has well said this is a game of battledore and shuttlecock, and in such a game I do not wish to participate.

Now, with reference to this measure, it is a part of the legislation that is being pressed not only before the Congress of the United States, but in every State of the Union—pressed by the labor unions, the railroad unions, the unions of employees of railroads, and opposed in every legislature in every State in the Union by the railroads themselves. It is one of the fruitful causes of that activity in politics by railroad corporations which is so much deplored, and it is with reference to diminishing that activity in politics that I have urged before the Senate that we enter upon a comprehensive plan of incorporating the interstate railroads under a national incorporation act. If we can do that we can cover this question of the insurance of employees against injuries, whether those injuries are the result of the negligence of the corporation itself or whether they are the result of the negligence of a fellow-employee.

Now we are legislating piecemeal every day and every month and every year upon the question of interstate commerce. We are now legislating with reference to rates——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I trust the Senator does not propose to defer action on these bills which are now up for discussion here to-day until the nationalization of railroads under the plan suggested by the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not propose to defer the one. What I wish to do is to accelerate the other, and I insist upon it that we are prepared now to enter upon this question of the national incorporation of railroads——

Mr. HOPKINS. Why combine the two? Why not let each stand on its merits?

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that within a month, if the Senator will permit me to say it, a bill can be reported to the Congress of the United States for the national incorporation of railroads which will cover every question of this piecemeal legislation that is now occupying the attention of Congress, taking up its time unnecessarily. We have within easy reach in a national incorporation act a solution for all these vexed questions.

What was one of the proposals of the national incorporation act which I have suggested, in addition to the question of the control of capitalization, in addition to the question of return upon capital, in addition to the question of a fair, comprehensive rule of taxation that would apply throughout the United States? One of the propositions was that a certain percentage of the gross receipts of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce should be put into an insurance fund, that fund to be responsive to the demands of employees who received injuries in the service, which is the public service.

The gross receipts of these railroads are $2,000,000,000 a year. If you set aside 1 per cent of the gross receipts, it will amount to $20,000,000 annually. Set that aside in a fund in the Treasury, to be invested in approved securities, and then allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rules upon which payments shall be made to the men receiving the injuries. It is a brutal thing to compel the employee receiving an injury, or his heirs if he is killed in an accident, to resort to the courts, to employ counsel, to submit to the law's delay in order to recover damages. There ought to be some easier and speedier method of securing justice to these people who serve the public in this great service, and the entire expense of it should be fastened upon the public in the shape of a transportation charge.

As it is to-day, the public, in freights and fares, pay the railroads the $2,000,000,000 which they receive. The public pay the operating expense. The public pay the taxes. The public pay interest upon the debt. The public pay dividends to the stockholders. Why should not the public pay 1 per cent more—only one-hundredth of the present receipts—into a fund in order to protect these men who are engaged in the service of the public in a semihazardous occupation? Such a percentage should be regarded as part of the fixed charges against railroad corporations, like taxes and insurance, and rates should be so fixed as to cover this charge in addition to the other operating expenses and fixed charges of the companies.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am not sure I understand the position of the Senator from Nevada, and for that reason I desire to ask him a question. Is it his position, relating to the nationalization of railroads, that if an employee—a brakeman or a conductor or flagman—on the Pennsylvania Railroad is injured and loses a leg or an arm, instead of the railroad company being liable for the damage, the general public shall pay it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. My proposition is this: That the public pays the entire income, the gross receipts of the railroads; that the entire transportation of the country is imposed upon the business and the transportation of the country; that $2,000,000,000 is received from the public for freights and fares. What I insist upon is that 1 per cent of that sum shall be set aside in an insurance fund for the protection of employees receiving injuries.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is the theory that the Senator presents on the question of damages that if an employee of a road in Pennsylvania or in Ohio is injured that that road has no more to do with paying damages than a road in New England or in California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it has no more to do with the payment of that damage than a road in California or in New England. That is my proposition.

Mr. HOPKINS. In view of that——

Mr. NEWLANDS. My proposition is to take the whole subject-matter out of litigation——

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And to do away with the necessity——

Mr. HOPKINS. In view of that——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to conclude——

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada, if he is a friend of the employees of railroad companies and desires to see that justice is done them, whether it would not be better to consider these bills which are now being discussed in the Senate separately and on their merits than to delay them until this plan which is now advocated by the Senator from Nevada becomes a law?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already answered that question. I propose to delay nothing. I do not propose to delay the consideration of the bill which has been presented by the railroad employees of the country. I do not wish to delay action upon the bill that is intended to regulate interstate rates. All I do suggest is that contemporaneously with that action and as a part of it we can within the next month present a national incorporation act which will embrace all these questions, and which will do away with this friction between the public and the railroads, between the employees and the railroads, and which will settle all these questions in a rational, comprehensive, and scientific way.

Mr. HOPKINS. I dislike to take up the time of the Senator, but he says it can all be done in a month.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator means it could all be done in a month if everybody approved of his plan in its comprehensive outline and in its details.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It could be done if that were accepted.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Nevada has been discussing this subject somewhat before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I should like to ask him if there is any prospect of that committee presenting his bill to the Senate within the near future?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not say. I see evidence of progress. Let me say that thus far almost every man who talks to me upon the subject says that the measure is all right, but it is ahead of the time. My answer is that if a thing is right, now is the time, always; and this thing is right.

I ask what additional questions does the national incorporation act involve?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I recollect that the Senator and I had a little discussion one day in a general way on his proposition, and I at that time was troubled by one phase of it, and that was the theory upon which the Senator was to arrange to take out of the States' power of taxation and regulation, transportation so far as it was intrastate. Has the Senator satisfied himself that it is within the constitutional capacity of Congress to pass a national railroad incorporation act requiring the interstate corporations of the country to organize under it, and to control independently of the State the purely State business which such railroad corporations would do?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I will say to the Senator that I have given a great deal of consideration to that question.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It has not been decided by the courts whether or not the National Congress in incorporating an interstate railway can exempt it from State regulations as to intrastate rates. But the courts have not decided to the contrary, and in the case of the Texas Pacific Railway, to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] referred the other day, they have determined that it is an open question; and the Senator from Texas objected to the national incorporation act which I proposed because he feared that the Supreme Court would finally determine that a national corporation, chosen as a national instrumentality for the purpose of carrying out a national purpose, would be freed from State regulation as to purely State commerce. That was his fear. My reply to him was that I hoped that that fear would be realized; that I believed that as interstate commerce constitutes three-fourths of the business of the entire country, and in some States, like Nebraska, embraces nineteen-twentieths of the business of the State, the greater sovereignty ought to create the machine that is to do all the people's business, and that it is unwise and impolitic to burden it with State legislation either as to taxation or regulation; that the public interest requires simplicity in taxation and in regulation, and that the varying systems of taxation and regulation embodied in the legislation of eight or ten or fifteen States through which an interstate railroad system passes tends to complexity and confusion.

Mr. SPOONER. I inferred from the observation of the Senator to the effect that this national incorporation act accomplishing a great reform could be passed within a month; that the Senator had become, upon further reflection and examination, satisfied that there was no constitutional impediment to his plan, through a national incorporation act, to entirely extricate the railroad transportation of the country from State taxation and State supervision, which is one of the objects the Senator very clearly and eloquently set forth in support of his proposition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But that is not the only object, let me state.

Mr. SPOONER. I know; but if this is a constitutional impediment, it could hardly be removed by the passage of an act of Congress. It would require something beyond that. It would require an amendment to the Constitution. I have not been able quite to make up my mind that the States can be compelled, by an act of Congress, to surrender to a national corporation the transportation arising in the State and ending in the State. Has the Senator?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I have not; but the bill can be made permissive or it can be made coercive. In the latter case only will the question to which the Senator has referred arise. But permissive legislation will, in my judgment, accomplish great good.

Mr. DANIEL. I dislike to interrupt this interesting discussion, if the Senator desires to go on, but we are very anxious to get this measure acted upon before 2 o'clock. There have been so many interruptions that I fear the Senator may be detained and we may not get action on the motion. If our friends will abbreviate their curiosity till after this motion is disposed of, it will be very agreeable. I do not mean this in the sense of a rebuke, of course.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course I do not wish to delay the Senate in the consideration of this motion, but I should like to answer very briefly—it will not take me more than five minutes, unless I am interrupted—the interrogatories of the Senator from Wisconsin, because I think it is appropriate that the answer should go into the RECORD now.

I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that while I should hope that in the end corporations organized under a national incorporation act, doing an interstate business amounting to three-fourths of the business of the country, should not be subject to State legislation either as to taxation or regulation, yet I should favor a national incorporation act even if the corporations were subject to both. I do not regard the regulation of intrastate rates as a very serious matter, for it involves so little of the commerce of each one of these corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and even though the legislation of the State may be somewhat embarrassing, it can not be so embarrassing as to counterbalance the great advantages which I think would be obtained by the scientific consolidation of roads under a national charter.

Now, so far as the question of taxation is concerned, I have not the slightest doubt, inasmuch as the power to tax involves the power to destroy, and as that taxation is to be imposed upon the entire instrumentality, in its completeness, used by Congress for the transaction of interstate commerce, that if Congress decides upon a fixed rule of taxation, uniform, reasonable, and just throughout the entire country, permitting the States to collect the tax upon that rule, the Supreme Court would determine that Congress has the power to fix such a rule.

We find that in the case of the national banks to-day the Congress of the United States fixes the rules of taxation and the States have to conform to it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator speaks of Congress permitting the States to collect this tax. Does he mean that the States are to collect taxes levied by Congress; that the States are to become agents of the National Government for the collection of taxes?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not propose that the National Government shall collect the taxes, but that the States shall.

Mr. SPOONER. But the rule is to be fixed by Congress?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The rule can be prescribed by Congress.

I go further than that. I think Congress can, if it chooses, absolutely exempt these corporations, as national instrumentalities, from all taxation, national or State; and as the greater must include the less, it necessarily follows that the Government can lay down the rule for the taxation by the States of these corporations engaged in interstate commerce; and I cite the Senator to the case of the national banks, which are national instrumentalities, and the Senator will find in the law incorporating national banks that the United States lays down the rule for their taxation by the States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to suggest, in reference to the bills now under consideration, that the railroad employees are not here asking for the relief the Senator from Nevada suggests. They are simply asking that they be put on a par, in respect to injuries received, with the rights given them in many of the States. Some of our Federal courts hold that a man engaged in the railroad service assumes the risk of the service, and hence that there is no liability. Then again they have extended the doctrine of fellow-servant, holding that where an injury occurs through a mistake or ignorance of a fellow-servant, there is no liability.

Now, in many of the Western States—and I am not familiar with the situation in all the States—the rule is that if an injury happens to an employee engaged in the railway service without his negligence contributing thereto, although it may have occurred through the negligence of a fellow-servant, as it is called, or although it may result from a defective machine or other matters pertaining to it, the railroad company is liable. This is not a question that belongs appropriately to the Judiciary Committee. It is simply a question of public policy—whether the Federal Government will accord to these railroad employees the same rights and privileges in respect to injuries that are accorded them by the laws of many of the States. That is the only question, and in respect to that question of public policy I should think the Committee on Interstate Commerce is as appropriate a committee as any. It is not a question involving legal technicalities or legal matters. It is simply a question whether it is right and just to make the railroads liable in these cases. I submit that the committee which deals with interstate commerce and all that pertains to it is the appropriate committee.

Now, when the railroad employees ask for the relief the Senator from Nevada suggests, that, I think, will be the proper time to consider that question. But they are not asking for that now. The question is whether we will give them the relief they ask for now in these bills or something of that kind.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I trust the Senator from Minnesota understands that I am not opposing any fair law for determining the liability of corporations engaged in interstate commerce for accidents to employees. I am simply pointing out what I regard as a better method of accomplishing the same result, one more humane to the employees, one less costly to the employees, one that takes this whole question out of politics—and it is now in politics in every State in the Union—and one that settles the matter for all time.

I do not wish the Senate to understand for a moment that I am going to delay the consideration of this bill, or that I oppose its consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee, but I do say that we are taking up this whole question of interstate commerce in the most fragmentary way, by piecemeal legislation, and that by the time we get through we shall find that years of legislation will have covered almost every inch of ground that would be covered by a national incorporation act passed now.

In the interest of the public, in the interest of the railroads themselves, and in the interest of the employees of the railroads, it does seem to me that we should have some comprehensive adjustment of this question that will prevent the overcapitalization of these great consolidated railroads; that will put them under some public control; that will fix the returns on capital; that will lay down a scientific rule of taxation; that will provide some humane method of compensating men who have received injuries or the heirs of men who have died as the result of injury in the service of the great railroad companies.

I insist upon it that now is as good a time as one year or two years hence, and that we will save the time of the Congress of the United States if, while considering this great regulation bill, we also attach to it simple provisions—and you will be amazed how simple the legislation is when your mind is directed to it—permitting the consolidation of railroads by national corporations under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Right now many of the consolidations of the country which have been eminently beneficial to the country are being threatened. In the House the other day a resolution was passed inquiring into the merger accomplished by the Pennsylvania Railroad, a merger which it is said has practically eliminated competition in the entire area covered by the trunk lines—the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Norfolk and Western.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to say the New York Central and the Pennsylvania and all those roads are merged?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I said that a resolution had passed the House inquiring into such a merger.

Now, for my part, I believe that these consolidations are wise, provided they are entered into with the approval of some commission representing the country at large, such commission controlling the capitalization and preventing overcapitalization. I believe that unrestrained and uncontrolled and undirected combination is bad. I believe that restrained and controlled and directed combination is good.

As a matter of fact, we know that in almost every section of the country competition is being eliminated by combinations that have taken place. Many of them, under the doctrine of the Northern Securities decision, in absolute violation of law. It would be a great misfortune if the entire country were thrown into confusion by decisions annulling the combinations which have been already accomplished.

It will not do to wait till a crisis comes. We should consider this question now instead of waiting till the courts destroy and dismember these combinations and reduce the entire transportation of the country to confusion, and then by legislation take up the fragments and endeavor to mold them into legalized combinations.

It is a well-known fact, whether a merger has been accomplished or not, that competition has been practically eliminated in the entire trunk-line area. It is an absolute fact in ten Southern States that competition has been practically eliminated by the mergers that have been accomplished through the Southern Railway system, the Atlantic Coast Line system, and the Illinois Central Railroad system, those three systems having combined now 26,000 miles of railroad out of less than 30,000 miles of railroad in ten or twelve Southern States. Mergers accomplished under the law of a single State, yet effectual in the commerce of many States.

I am admonished that we are approaching the close of the morning hour, Mr. President, and I will not pursue this line further. I shall take the opportunity, however, at a later day, to say something on this subject.

Mr. PATTERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; because it was my desire to get the floor not for the purpose of discussing this question. I want to discuss the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and give my views, which are not quite in harmony with the views of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber, on the matter of the Monroe doctrine, the Santo Domingo treaty, and the pending arrangement between the President and Santo Domingo. But it is very desirable, I think, that this motion should be disposed of in some way, and I yield the floor for the time being to the Senator from Georgia, to resume it when I can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as there has been no distinct statement by any member of the Judiciary Committee who was a member at the time the bill was reported back to the Senate with a request that the committee be discharged and that it be then referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I desire to state, so far as I myself understood the action of the committee, the ground upon which it was based. It was not from any disposition to shirk a duty nor from any disposition to engage in the game of shuttlecock and battledoor, to which allusion has more than once been made.

The bill, as it appeared to the committee, is an extremely far-reaching measure, one, so far as I know, absolutely novel in its provisions and in the purposes which it seeks to accomplish. If it were a bill which sought to fix the rule of the liability of railroad companies to its employees in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, there would be no question that it would be a bill which should go to the Judiciary Committee. But the bill goes very much farther than that. In fact, that feature of it is infinitesimal compared with that which it embraces in its totality.

It is a bill which proposes to fix the rule of the liability of railroad companies for damages to employees not simply in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, but the rule of damages in all cases and in all jurisdictions of railroads which are engaged in interstate commerce, and as almost every railroad in the United States of any consequence is engaged in interstate commerce it may be said to be practically a bill which proposes to take away from the State the right to fix what shall be the rule of damages in case of an injury to an employee by a railroad company in that State and to have a rule of damages which shall be enacted by the Congress of the United States applied to every railroad in the United States that is engaged in interstate commerce. This would also necessarily devolve upon the Federal courts in each State the jurisdiction to try all cases against railroad companies in suits against them to recover damages for personal injuries. The magnitude of that question must strike everyone without any comment upon it whatever. The Senate will perceive that the great question presented by the bill is not the question, as suggested, simply whether this is a correct rule of damages, but whether or not under the interstate-commerce provision of the Constitution it is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States to pass a law which shall fix the rule of liability for damages in all cases in the United States in suits for personal injuries to employees.

It was for that reason, Mr. President, that the Judiciary Committee thought that a bill involving a question which hinged, and necessarily turned, upon the question whether it was a matter within the interstate-commerce provision of the Constitution should be with the Interstate Commerce Committee rather than with the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee considered this question in two sessions of Congress, and the then chairman of the committee, the former senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, was very decidedly of the opinion that it was a question which should be determined, or rather which should be examined upon and reported to the Senate, by the Interstate Commerce Committee rather than by the Judiciary Committee.

I will state for the information of the Senate that, so far as the interests of my State are concerned, the bill would have very little effect, because the first two sections of the bill, which are the important ones, and which more immediately relate to the question of liability, are now substantially the law of Georgia. That is the fixed law of Georgia, and I approve of that law as the law of my State. But as to whether or not the Congress of the United States shall hereafter have jurisdiction to fix the question of what shall be the liability of a railroad company in California, or in Maine, or in Louisiana, or Texas, or Pennsylvania, and whether each of these States and all other States shall thereafter surrender the right to fix the question of the liability of railroads for such damages, and shall surrender the jurisdiction of the State courts to try such cases and turn them all over to the Federal courts, is an immense question.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who is the author of the bill, says to me that the States would not surrender it. Of course I would hesitate to differ from him on that subject, because he has given it very much more thought than I have. I have simply been guided by what I think is the plain reading of the bill and what I know to have been the view taken of it by the Judiciary Committee. I will read it for the purpose of seeing whether or not I am correct, and I will take but a minute; I see the time is nearly out before the expiration of the morning hour. The language is this:

That every common carrier by railroad engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States, or between any Territory and another, or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States, or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, shall be liable to any of its employees, who are occupied in such trade or commerce, or, in the case of his death, to his heirs at law, for all damages which may result from the negligence or mismanagement of any of its officers, agents, or employees, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works.

That, as I have said, is the law of Georgia now. So I am not arguing as to anything which would affect my State or change the law from what it now is, except in so far as it would take the jurisdiction in all such cases from our State courts and confer the same upon the Federal courts, which would be a great hardship on the railroad employees. But it seems to me that that language would confer upon the Congress of the United States the right to legislate as to those matters, as to any railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and it could not be a concurrent jurisdiction between the Congress of the United States and the several States to legislate upon the same subject.

But I do not propose to discuss the question now. I simply rose for the purpose of suggesting the reasons why the Judiciary Committee thought the bill ought to go to the Interstate Commerce Committee. It was because it involved a great interstate-commerce question and must hinge upon the decision whether it was within the provision of the Constitution giving to Congress the right to legislate with reference to interstate commerce. I wished also to say that I think it ought to remain with the Committee on Interstate Commerce and that the Judiciary Committee was correct in the suggestion upon which the Senate acted in referring it to that committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, if there will be a vote taken upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia now, I will yield for that purpose, but I will not yield for any other purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. We can not get a vote until after I am heard. I have been sitting here for about an hour in order to get in. I did not care to rush roughshod over others.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is perfectly manifest that this matter can not be disposed of this afternoon.

Mr. DANIEL. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. Therefore I desire to hold the floor until the time for placing the regular business of the session before the Senate arrives, that I may have the floor at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to ask from the Chair the present parliamentary status of this matter of reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], that the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bills and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Two questions are involved, and the first question is on the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Before the motion is put, as a member of the Judiciary Committee I wish to say with reference to the merits of the bill or any other that it was only upon due consideration in the last Congress the Judiciary Committee came to the conculsion, and so reported through its chairman to the Senate, that the proper jurisdiction of the bill belonged to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. They did that after consideration, and did it with no desire to evade responsibility or to shirk work. That was the position of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary at that time, and it is the position held by some members of the committee at this time. I make that statement simply as an explanation.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me just one word?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. ELKINS. After the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, has an opportunity to be heard, with the consent of the members of the committee, which has been obtained, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw my request. But I will not do so until after the Senator from South Carolina has had an opportunity to be heard. I want to give notice to the Senator from Colorado what my purpose is.

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not understand the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I stated that after the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, has had an opportunity to be heard, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the request I made and leave the two bills in the Interstate Commerce Committee.

That will dispose of the question. But I do not want to make that request until after the Senator from South Carolina has been heard, if the Senator from Colorado will yield to him.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I did intend to address the Senate upon the subject that has engrossed a good deal of its time and that involves questions as momentous as those that are involved not so much in the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina as in cognate questions that have been referred to and discussed and enlarged upon by Senators upon both sides of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have some amendments that I desire to offer to the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me get the status at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire understands——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the regular order and displaces all other business under the rule.

Mr. PATTERSON. That at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow I will have the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator may give notice to that effect.

Mr. PATTERSON. I give notice now that I will continue to-morrow, at the conclusion of the morning business, the remarks I commenced this afternoon.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I only rose to make an inquiry as to what the ruling is upon the request of the Senator from Colorado. I do not understand that any Senator can preempt the floor except by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado has made no request, but has simply given notice.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand he has no right on that account except the general right which attaches to giving a notice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair agrees with the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask may be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 2, after the word "thereof," the first word in the line, insert:

engaged exclusively as a common carrier for the service of the public.

So as to read:

SEC. 2. That in the interest of the national defense and for the performance of the public services hereinafter specified, after July 1, 1907, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, subject to the provisions of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the owner or owners of any vessel hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States (including as such citizens any corporation created under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof, engaged exclusively as a common carrier for the service of the public), subventions as hereinafter provided, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 21, page 7, after the word "of," where it first occurs, I move to insert "section 2 of;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That before receiving any subvention under the provisions of section 2 of this act the owner or owners of any vessel shall contract, in writing, with sufficient sureties, with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to fulfill each and all of the following obligations, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In line 7, page 9, after the word "no" and before the word "dry," I move to insert the word "American;" so as to read:

Fifth. That all ordinary repair or overhauling of said vessel shall be made in the United States, except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no American dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within a distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when the repairs shall be needed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 11, line 11, I move the same amendment after the word "no;" so as to read:

except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no American dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within a distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when the repairs shall be desired, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 13 I move to strike out lines 14 to 23, inclusive.

The SECRETARY. On page 13 strike out from line 14 to line 23, inclusive, in the following words:

Eighth. From a port of the Atlantic coast of the United States to the United Kingdom and northern Europe, on steamships of the United States of not less than 20 knots speed, for a weekly service at a maximum compensation not exceeding $250,000 a year in addition to the compensation now provided pursuant to contract under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 16 I move to strike out lines 4 to 17, inclusive, which is the provision for an increased tonnage tax, section 8.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 8 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 8. That a duty of 8 cents per net ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 80 cents per net ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry by sea on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, the coast of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, or Newfoundland; and a duty of 16 cents per net ton, not to exceed in the aggregate $1.60 per net ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry by sea on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any other foreign port or place, not, however, to include vessels in distress or not engaged in trade.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out section 10 of the bill likewise, that having relation to section 8, which has just been stricken out.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 10, in the following words:

SEC. 10. That section 14 of the act approved June 26, 1884, entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and to encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes;" sections 11 and 12 of the act approved June 19, 1886, entitled "An act to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes;" section 1 of the act approved April 4, 1888, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes;" so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this act, and section 4232 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. Would it not be a good idea to have the bill reprinted?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am going to have that done. There is one other amendment which I should like to state. I shall move to amend the title of the bill so as to read:

A bill to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish ocean mail lines to foreign markets, and to promote commerce.

I now ask that the bill be reprinted, showing all the amendments that have been made up to the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to know what consideration, by what committee or commission, has been given to the amendments which the Senator has offered to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the Committee on Commerce has not had the privilege of giving them consideration. I did not suppose it was necessary in matters of this kind to take them before the committee which originally authorized the bill to be reported. I conferred, I will say to the Senator, with sundry Senators who have been interested in this subject and who have given it a great deal of thought, and it was deemed wise to make these amendments.

Mr. FRYE. I think the amendment which takes away from the American line the increased subsidy will convert the American line into a British line before a great while.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, Mr. President, the Senator is probably correct in that contention.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to say a word or two in relation to section 8. I regard that section as of the gravest importance. For a great many years we have been living in our country under a tonnage tax, which was not in the least oppressive, 3 cents, I think, a ton from all vessels entering our ports from neighboring countries, not to exceed five entries in a year. That would be 15 cents; all other entries from foreign ports 6 cents a ton, not to exceed 30 cents; a very moderate tax indeed.

During all these years our ships entering foreign ports have been paying from two to three and almost four times as heavy a tax.

I reported from the Committee on Commerce a few years ago a bill increasing our tonnage tax. It ought to be increased beyond any manner of question. We ought not to give such preferences to foreign commerce as are given by their heavy taxes upon our ships that enter their ports. Great Britain took notice of the fact that such a law had been reported, and immediately—if I remember aright—reduced her tax to about the level of ours.

Mr. GALLINGER. A little larger.

Mr. FRYE. A little larger, but only a little larger—almost to a level with ours. No other country took notice of it or did any such thing. They are still making our ships pay very excessive taxes at every entry which we make.

I want just as briefly as can be done to give these taxes. The British taxes, I say, were reduced pretty nearly to the level of ours.

German tax, 8 cents every arrival; ours, 6 cents (five arrivals, and no more); and the steamships will average probably ten arrivals, which would make the German tax 80 cents as against ours of 30 cents. French, 20 cents each arrival. If it made ten arrivals it would be $2. Italian, 27 cents; Spanish, 48½ cents; Norwegian, 35 cents; Austrian, 16 cents.

The tax which we have been imposing upon these foreign ships entering our ports has been a mere bagatelle, and the taxes which they have imposed on our ships entering their ports have run from two to three times greater than ours.

So I say I regard this section of the bill as of very great importance. The tonnage tax should be increased beyond peradventure. I hope if this bill passes the Senate and goes to the House of Representatives there the constitutional question which has been raised here will be laid to one side and that they will reincorporate in the bill an increased tonnage tax. I hope, though, it will not be so high a tonnage tax as this section 8 provides for. In my judgment, it is too high. It should not be higher than the average taxes which are imposed upon our vessels entering foreign ports. That is all that I desire to say about it.

I suppose this section is stricken out undoubtedly because the constitutional question has been raised in the Senate, and the Senator from New Hampshire did not wish to hazard the bill by having that question discussed and passed upon here.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, Mr. President, is quite right in his closing suggestion. While some of us have felt that the constitutional question was at least a matter that could be doubted, some of us holding that it is not unconstitutional to provide revenue of an incidental nature in connection with a bill of this kind, yet the matter was so earnestly and so persistently and properly opposed by certain distinguished Senators on the other side—lawyers of eminence—that having this bill in charge it seemed to me it would not be profitable for us to consume a great deal of time in discussing that question and hazard the passage of the bill if we insisted upon keeping it in the bill.

For that reason it has been stricken out, and I join with the Senator from Maine in the hope that the House of Representatives, where no constitutional question can arise, may restore the section, at least increasing the tonnage tax to some extent. I agree with the Senator that the amount named in the bill is too high, and had the section remained in the bill I would have moved to reduce it.

Now, Mr. President, that was the motive which prompted me to move to eliminate the section from the bill, and I trust that the bill will now commend itself more warmly to the support of those who have been opposing it than it did in the first instance.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] intends to address himself to the bill, but he is temporarily out of the Chamber, and if there is any other business that will occupy a little time I will lay the bill aside or I will be glad to have other Senators discuss the subject.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I only rise to say, in reference to what has just been said by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that possibly I am one of those who so persistently advanced this question of constitutional law connected with this feature of the bill. I did not do so for the purpose of embarrassing the majority at all, but because I was conscientious in the belief that if retained in the bill in that shape the House of Representatives would send it back to us with some such suggestion as they attached to a measure which, in my judgment, was less obnoxious to that seventh section of the tenth article of the Constitution than is this bill.

I do not mean to say now that that provision of the bill is unconstitutional, but I think it is a matter for us to consider. I do not think it would take a very long time for us to determine, so far as the Senate is concerned, whether it is safe to put it in a bill or not. I merely want to put myself aright. I had no desire or purpose whatever to gratuitously interfere with the progress of this bill; but a matter of that kind is, in my judgment, extremely important, involving, as it may, the privileges of the two Houses, and I consequently desired to bring the matter to the consideration of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Florida a question before he takes his seat.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Does not the Senator believe that the tonnage tax should be increased?

Mr. MALLORY. From what it now is?

Mr. FRYE. From what it now is.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; I think so. I agree with the Senator from Maine as to that. As I said, I think it is probably too high as fixed in the bill, but I think it is too low as it is now under the law. I should be perfectly willing to see it increased from what it is now, but it would be rather an injury than a benefit to increase it to the extent which is proposed in this bill.

Mr. FRYE. I agree with the Senator that it is too high in this bill. There is no doubt about that. It will provoke tremendous hostility to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is really no need of my attempting to discuss at any length the principles involved in this shipping bill or in the report of the Commission. The general argument was covered with such thoroughness and such masterly grasp of the subject by the chairman of the Commission, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that there is nothing for me to add to it. But there were one or two points made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] upon which I should like to say a few words. One was in reference to the constitutionality of granting subsidies or bounties for the purpose of encouraging the shipping of the United States.

The Senator from Florida in his speech disputed the constitutional right of Congress to pass legislation of this character, and made one or two citations in support of that contention.

Mr. President, the grant of a bounty or a subsidy is a power which is recognized by all the authorities as inherent in any sovereign government. It has been, in fact, so generally recognized that I do not think it has ever been specifically contested. The Senator from Florida read from Judge Cooley's work on Taxation in support of his position, but the passage he cited was rather as to the expediency than as to the constitutionality of legislation of this character. He also cited a decision of Mr. Justice Miller in the case of The Loan Association v. Topeka, in 20 Wallace; but it seems to me that that case is very easily distinguishable. In the Topeka case a bonus was given to a particular firm or company. The principle adopted by all the courts is that a bounty must be for a public object; and that if it is for a public purpose the right of a sovereign State to grant it is uncontested. But the Topeka case, as I have said, is easily distinguishable on the ground that it was for the benefit of a particular person. Mr. Justice Miller in his decision uses the phrase, "private or personal object," and he uses it repeatedly. He says:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and to build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

But he further says:

> And in deciding whether in the given case the object for which the taxes are assessed falls upon the one side or the other of this line they must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the Government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether State or municipal. Whatever lawfully pertains to this and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people may well be held to belong to the public use, and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation.

He thus draws the distinction plainly between a subsidy or a bounty given for a public purpose and one given for the benefit of a private individual, or, as in the case before the court, for the benefit of a particular firm or company. Now, the subvention in this bill is offered to every company, firm, or individual in the United States who is ready to build and operate ships in our foreign commerce; it is open to all the people of the United States; it is not confined to a particular firm or company, and the question therefore is simply whether the purpose of that bounty or subvention is a public purpose, and adopting the criterion set up by Mr. Justice Miller, whether it is in accordance with the usage and the general practice of governments.

The purpose of this bill is to offer encouragement by means of a payment of money to every man who will join the naval reserve or who will go into the deep-sea fisheries on the theory that it is a school for sailors, with a view to their fitness to serve the flag at any time and in any emergency. It is exactly parallel, so far as the naval reserve is concerned, to the bounty offered to soldiers and sailors to enlist. It is an encouragement to any man who will take service to enter upon it in the belief that in doing so he serves a great public object.

We spend money in order to educate and prepare officers for the Navy. Surely it is equally legitimate to spend money in the way of bounty or subvention or in any other manner for the education and preparation of seamen, which is clearly a public object. Mr. President, in support of this contention I desire to call attention to the case of Allen v. Smith, in volume 173 of the United States Reports. That was a case involving the sugar bounty, a case arising under a will as to the disposition of sugar bounties earned by the testator's estate.

Mr. SPOONER. Under the tariff act of 1890?

Mr. LODGE. Under the tariff act of 1890. In that case the court recognize absolutely the legitimate character and the constitutionality of that bounty. The question, of course, which they were deciding was simply the disposition of it under the will, but the language of the court is worth reading in this connection. In speaking of the bounty, the court say:

> It was not so much a gift by the Government as a reward paid in consideration of expenses incurred by the planters upon the faith of the Government's promise to pay a bounty to the manufacturers and producers of sugar. As applied to this case, we think the act of 1895 should be construed as a continuation of the prior bounty.

Recognizing in that way the legitimate character of that bounty.

> To say that it is an "unwilled asset" is practically to hold that it is a gift from the Government "without anything in the nature of a consideration," and that the amount of sugar produced is only to be considered as the measure of the bounty. This dissociates the bounty altogether from the motive which actuated Congress in granting it, and turns it into a mere donation of so much money, which it can not be presumed to have made, even if it had the power.

The court, following the exact line of distinction laid down by Mr. Justice Miller, then said:

> Bounties granted by a government are never pure donations, but are allowed either in consideration of services rendered or to be rendered, objects of public interest to be obtained, production or manufacture to be stimulated, or moral obligations to be recognized. To grant a bounty irrespective altogether of these considerations would be an act of pure agrarianism, and to determine who is entitled to the benefit of the bounty is but little more than to determine who has rendered the consideration.

You will observe that they say that bounties granted by the Government are allowed either in consideration of services rendered or to be rendered, objects of public interest to be obtained, production or manufacture to be stimulated; in other words, they held that the encouragement of the sugar industry was "an object of public interest to be obtained, of production and manufacture which could be properly stimulated by the Government;" that it met the requirement of a public object and therefore was entirely legitimate. Can there be any doubt that the training of seamen for the national defense is as legitimate a public purpose as growing sugar?

Mr. President, I think no one can dispute that the object of this bill is an object of public interest; that it is not confined to a particular firm, person, or corporation; that it is open to every citizen of the United States, and, more than all this, that it is in absolute accord with a long line of precedents of legislative action which meets the last test established by Mr. Justice Miller in the usage and practice of the Government.

Let us examine the history of the policy of the United States as to encouraging and training seamen.

The fishery bounties were first granted by act of February 16, 1792, at the rate of $1.50 per ton to vessels between 20 and 30 tons, and $2.50 per ton to vessels of above 30 tons—engaged for four months of a year, three-eighths going to the owners and five-eighths to the crew.

By act of July 8, 1797, the bounties were increased 33⅓ per cent.

By act of March 3, 1807, the bounties were repealed, and salt was put on the free list for the benefit of the fishermen.

The enrolled and licensed fishery tonnage fell off from 70,306 in 1807 to 30,459 in 1812—due in part to the embargo and later the war.

By act of July 29, 1813, bounties were again given to vessels "carrying on the bank and other cod fisheries," at the rate of $2.40 for vessels above 20 and below 30 tons and $4 for vessels above 30 tons for four months' service in a year.

The bounties were given at first ostensibly in part in compensation for the salt duties, but the salt duties were reduced from 20 cents a bushel finally to 2½ cents, and the bounties were not lessened.

Between 1815 and 1857 $12,128,000 was expended in bounties. The tonnage of the cod fisheries increased from 26,510 to 104,573, and the men from 3,711 to 13,545.

In the early years of the bounties the deep-sea fisheries were intensely a local industry. Doctor Seybert, in his Statistical Annals (1818), says:

> Our fishermen have been almost exclusively confined to the New England States; of these Massachusetts had the greatest share. * * * In the cod fishery no vessel (except 48⅔ tons returned for New Jersey in 1803 and 66⅔ for Virginia in 1796) was owned south of New York.

Now the ocean fisheries are carried on out of Florida ports, and in the North Pacific from San Francisco and Puget Sound.

The fisheries were seriously reduced after 1861—the war drawing the men into the Navy and Army—and in 1866 the bounties were discontinued and free salt in bond for curing fish was granted.

Mr. President, for more than seventy years bounties were given by our Government to fishermen without any requirement as to a naval reserve, such as we find in the pending bill, but simply because, in the judgment of the Congress during that long period, the fisheries, although then a very local industry—far more localized than they are now—were a matter of public interest sufficient to demand this special aid and encouragemen from the Government of the United States.

It is not at all unusual for governments to make such gifts or bounties to the fishing industry. At this very time fishery bounties are given by Canada, France, Germany, and Japan. Our fishermen have to compete with their near neighbors in Canada who receive a large bounty, being the income of the Halifax award, which was funded, and the annual income of that $5,000,000 award is distributed in bounties to the Canadian fishermen.

One of the earliest questions which confronted our Government was the encouragement of our merchant marine and fisheries. The merchant marine was encouraged by discriminating duties; the fisheries by a direct bounty. I have given already the date of the original act, but the report of Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, on that question is one of the most interesting of our early State papers. Discussing the whole history of the fisheries, the entire report is an argument in favor of special aid to that industry. He says:

> On the whole—

Mr. Jefferson says—> the historical view we have taken of these fisheries proves they are so poor in themselves as to come to nothing with distant nations—

He means nations distant from the fishing grounds—> who do not support them from their treasury.

He recognizes absolutely the propriety of support to the fishing industry for reasons which he has set out at length in this famous report. He says further:

> We have seen that the advantages of our position—

That is, our neighborhood to the fishing grounds—

> place our fisheries on a ground somewhat higher, such as to relieve our Treasury from giving them support; but not to permit it to draw support from them, nor to dispense the Government from the obligation of effectuating free markets for them.

His argument is that we should take special pains to compel free markets for them and that we should furnish them with their salt free. But Congress decided that it was necessary to go further and passed the direct bounty act to which I have referred.

It is perfectly clear that granting bounties, from the well-recognized and familiar instance of the enlistment bounty to the soldier and the sailor, is a right inherent in sovereignty, a right which has never been questioned. The only question as to granting a bounty is whether it accords with the principles which have been stated by Mr. Justice Miller—that is, whether it is a bonus to a particular firm or person, or whether it is open to all the citizens of the country equally; whether it is for the promotion of a private object, or for the encouragement of some industry or some manufacture which is of general public interest, and, lastly, whether it is in accordance with the usages of governments generally.

Mr. President, it is too clear to require argument that in this particular case the bounty or the subvention proposed for our shipping is open to all the citizens of the United States; that it is designed to further a great public object—the encouragement and development of our merchant marine, which those of us who have taken an interest in this subject—and I think we all do—believe would be of great and general advantage to the country at large, and, lastly, it is proved absolutely by many years of Congressional action that it has been the usage of this country to grant bounties to persons engaged in the fisheries and in the merchant marine, and also that it has been the practice in the past and is to-day the practice of other governments. It does not seem to me, Mr. President, that on that ground it is possible to contest successfully the constitutionality of this bill. On the contrary, in this bill we are following one of the policies adopted at the beginning of the Government and pursued for three-quarters of a century for the promotion of an industry, which all the Congresses and Executives of that period, without any distinction of party, conceived to be for the general interest of the entire country.

Now, I wish to take up another single point which has been brought recently to my attention. American shipowners and seamen, the men engaged in the actual operation and management of shipping, have been subjected not only to the rivalry of other nations and thrown without protection into the great arena of trade competition, but they have been obliged to meet special opposition in the bounties and the discriminations of various kinds used by other governments for the promotion of their own commerce. Quite recently there has been brought to my attention an organization, to which I have not seen allusion before, known as the "Sailing Ship Owners' International Union." It is a great combination of the sailing vessels of three countries—Great Britain, France, and Germany. They have formed a huge trust or combination to regulate the price of freight carried in sailing vessels.

Twenty or thirty years ago the best trade in which great sail ships engaged was the export of grain from our Pacific States around Cape Horn to Europe. American vessels, most of them built in New England and officered and largely manned by New England men, were the leaders in this trade, and it was a matter of record that American ships not only made the swiftest passages, but met with the fewest accidents, and delivered their cargoes of wheat in the best condition. Notwithstanding this fact, the powerful British insurance monopoly of Lloyds so discriminated in rates against these American ships that one by one they were driven out of the traffic and forced to seek refuge in the coastwise trade or become coal hulks and barges.

I may say, in passing, that the discrimination used by Lloyds has been one of the greatest obstacles in the way of the rehabilitation of our merchant marine, and one of the principal causes of the injuries inflicted upon it in the past.

Now the owners of the British ships, which, with some German and French ships, monopolize the wheat trade, have formed a hard and fast combination known as the "Sailing Ship Owners' International Union." More than 75 per cent of British, French, and German sail tonnage have joined this combination, as follows:

Country.	Total tonnage, 1,000 tons and upward, excluding liners.	Tonnage entered international union.
Great Britain	1,127,809	848,522
France	299,073	240,605
Germany	365,710	277,822
Total	1,792,592	1,366,949

Apparently no American ships are admitted to this European combination, though a few are still afloat. This European shipping trust has its headquarters at Leadenhall Buildings, London, and from this London office has issued a ukase to govern our American wheat trade.

Its methods are the approved and familiar methods of great industrial combinations or trusts everywhere. Its business is "managed by a committee consisting of seven representatives from Great Britain, four from France, and four from Germany."

This committee shall from time to time fix the minimum rates of freight—

I am quoting from their rules—from the various loading ports as they judge best, in their absolute discretion.

Such owners as agree to join this union shall bind themselves not to accept for the ships which they control less than the minimum rate appointed by the above-mentioned international committee for any voyage for which the committee shall have fixed a rate of freight.

The committee shall have power to call upon each member of the union to disclose on oath the rate of freight and conditions of any charter.

In the event of any member of the union committing any breach of his undertaking, or of the rules of the union, he shall pay liquidated damages to the committee of 5 shillings per ton on the dead-weight capacity of the ship in connection with which the breach had been committed, but should such breach be committed unwittingly and through no fault of the member, the committee have discretion to modify the damages.

The object of the union is to control the grain rates of the world by means of this combination of sailing vessels.

This remarkable combination seems to have been of British free-trade origin, for a British newspaper article describing it states that—

It is practically the creation of Mr. R. W. Leyland, the well-known Liverpool shipowner.

And this British newspaper goes on to declare exultantly that—

The International Union of Sailing Ship Owners is the most remarkable body of its kind in the world. Indeed, it may be regarded as the most powerful shipping combination in existence, and it has no parallel in the international character of its constitution, which at first appeared to be a weakness, but is now seen to be a source of strength, for without foreign cooperation the union would have been impossible, and the French and German owners are even more enthusiastic for the union, if possible, than the British.

But the most interesting feature of this European shipowning combination to the American people, and especially to our Western farmers, is to be found in rule No. 2:

The only object of the union for the present shall be to fix minimum rates of freight for the principal voyages in which sailing ships engage, excepting only outward voyages from the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe, for which no rates of freight shall be arranged, each vessel being left free to make the best terms she can.

That is from their own countries they do not make a combined rate. These European shipowners have not framed their "combine" for the sake of increasing freight rates on the export products of their own countries. They are careful to give their own manufacturers and farmers at home the benefit of the most-favored treatment—low rates and free competition. Where they set their "combine" to work is on the export trade of the western coast of the United States; and the "combine" wrings its profits out of the harvests of the western farmers.

Here are a group of British, French, and German shipowners controlling 75 per cent of the available ocean sail tonnage of the world, dictating from London what tariff in the form of freight shall be imposed upon American products where they come into competition with their own products and at the same time leaving the market open to competition for the carrying of their own products into our country and other countries where they have to compete with local manufacturers and producers.

Under date of June 1, 1904, this foreign shipping trust fixed, in a circular signed at the Leadenhall Buildings by O. H. Pollak, honorary secretary, freight rates on the wheat of our far western farmers exported from San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma, or Seattle at a minimum of from 22 shillings 6 pence to 27 shillings 6 pence. Before this trust was formed the French subsidized ships had pulled the freight rates down as low as 17 shillings.

Therefore, the first stroke of this "combine" was to exact from our western wheat growers in freight money on shipments to Europe from 5 to 10 shillings per ton, or, in other words, from $1.25 to $2.50 on every ton of American grain sent around the Horn to Europe.

They put up the price from 5 to 10 shillings per ton by the formation of this trust and combination among these foreign shipowners, which is really directed at our grain trade from our western ports. The idea that we are leaving our freight carrying open to free competition and that thereby we are getting better freight rates is shown to be absolutely without foundation. As a matter of fact, we are helplessly at the mercy of this foreign combination.

American ships, driven off by Lloyds and almost destroyed by French subsidies, are now too few and far between to offer any effective resistance against this audacious European monopoly, which, from its headquarters in London, filches its profits from the pockets of American farmers and sneers at American law.

This is one result of the loss of our American merchant marine. If we had American ships, and if they attempted to form a monopoly like this, our courts could reach them, for their owners would be within our authority. But the jurisdiction of American antitrust legislation does not extend to Leadenhall Buildings in London.

Mr. President, I will ask to have printed in connection with what I have been saying copies of the circular and the table of rates fixed by the International Shipowners' Union and also a copy of their rules, which will show exactly how they operate in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Without objection, the papers referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

THE SAILING SHIP OWNERS' UNION—THE RULES.

Mr. O. H. Pollack, the honorary secretary of the Sailing Ship Owners' International Union, has sent to all the shipowners who have joined the union a letter, in which he states that more than 75 per cent of British, French, and German tonnage have joined, and the union has therefore been constituted. The figures are as follows:

Country.	Total tonnage, 1,000 tons and upward, excluding liners.	Tonnage entered, International Union.
Great Britain	1,127,809	848,522
France	299,073	240,605
Germany	365,710	277,822
Total	1,792,592	1,366,949

RULES.

The rules are as follows:

(1) The association shall be called "The Sailing Ship Owners' International Union," and its headquarters shall be situated in London.

(2) The only object of the union for the present shall be to fix minimum rates of freight for the principal voyages in which sailing ships engage, excepting only outward voyages from the United Kingdom or continent of Europe, for which no rates of freight shall be arranged, each vessel being left free to make the best terms she can.

(3) The business of the union shall be managed by a committee, consisting of seven representatives from Great Britain, four from France, and four from Germany, who shall meet where and as often as they think desirable in the general interest, with leave, in case of necessity, to each member of the committee to send a substitute of his own nationality who is a member of the union. This committee shall remain in office until 31st December in each year. Prior to that time the representative or representatives on the committee of each group of members of the union—British, French, German, or any other nationality—shall call a general meeting of the members of that group, at which the representative or representatives shall be elected to represent that group on the committee for twelve months from the ensuing 1st January. Due intimation of the election to be sent to the secretary of the international committee. The persons named above shall be the first committee of the union, and shall remain in office till 31st December, 1904.

(4) This committee shall from time to time fix the minimum rates of freight from the various loading ports as they judge best in their absolute discretion, and they shall have power to fix different minimum freights for ships of different sizes. Intimation of the rates of freight fixed by this committee shall, as required from time to time, be given to the members of the union per circular letter. This letter shall name a date for any specified rate coming into force, and this date shall apply to the charter party or loading agreement and not to the actual loading date. Not less than five days shall elapse between the dispatch of any registered letter from the London office of the union and any rate of freight which it prescribes becoming operative.

(5) Such owners as agree to join this union shall bind themselves not to accept for the ships which they control less than the minimum rate appointed by the above-mentioned international committee for any voyage for which the committee shall have fixed a rate of freight, and for all such voyages the various owners are prohibited from chartering except on the recognized terms of charter for the particular trade without any extra commissions, rebates, or back letters. Owners, however, shall be allowed to reimburse the charterers the net cost of any extra insurance the latter may have to pay on the cargo owing to the age or special condition of the ship.

(6) Should the minimum rates of freight not be obtainable for any vessel she shall be laid up until such a rate can be got, or, in the option of the owners, she has liberty to leave the port in ballast.

(7) The committee shall have power to call upon each member of the union to disclose on oath the rate of freight and conditions of any charter.

(8) In the event of any member of the union committing any breach of his undertaking or of the rules of the union, he shall pay liquidated damages to the committee of 5s per ton on the deadweight capacity of the ship in connection with which the breach has been committed, but should said breach be committed unwittingly and through no fault of the member, the committee have discretion to modify the damages.

(9) Only owners of ships of 1,000 tons net register and upward shall be eligible to be enrolled in this union.

(10) The various owners joining this union shall remain members thereof from year to year, but may terminate their membership at 31st December in any year on giving two months' written notice (say on or before 31st October of that year) to the committee.

(11) To provide for the expenses of the union each owner enrolled shall contribute, in advance £1 sterling per annum for each of his vessels of 1,000 tons net register and upwards.

COMMITTEE.

Representing France: M. Eugene Pergeline, of Nantes, vice-president; M. Leon Gueugnier, of Paris; M. Eugene Salles, of Marseille; M. Joseph Polo, of Nantes.

Representing Germany: Mr. F. Loesener Sloman, of Hamburg, vice-president; Mr. F. W. Dahlstrom, of Hamburg; Mr. Emil Watjen, of Bremen; Mr. A. D. Vinnen, of Bremen.

Mr. O. H. Pollak, Leadenhall buildings, London, E. C., is the honorable secretary.

A scale of minimum freights has also been sent to the shipowners, and, of course, it is the object of the union to try and raise these rates. The dates upon which the scale takes effect vary with each port, the earliest date being July 15.

[From an occasional contributor.]

The International Union of Sailing Ship Owners is the most remarkable body of its kind in the world. Indeed, it may be regarded as the most powerful shipping combination in existence, and it has no parallel in the international character of its constitution, which at first appeared to be a weakness, but is now seen to be a source of strength, for without foreign cooperation the union would have been impossible, and the French and German owners are even more enthusiastic for the union, if possible, than the British. The union does not include sailing ship "liners" of 1,000 tons and upward, because these do not come into competition with the "tramps," who are chiefly hit by the ruling low rates. Excluding, therefore, these liners, there remain 1,792,592 tons of British and foreign sailing ships that could possibly join the union, and the total quantity that has joined the union is no less than 1,366,949 tons, so that the balance outside is only 425,643 tons, too small to offer effective competition to the union; besides which, some of those still outside, if not all, will no doubt join should the union realize the hopes of its promoters.

There will be great curiosity in shipping circles to see how such a novel and powerful combination works. It is formed to fix homeward freights alone, whether for the United Kingdom or the Continent, and not outward, as to which members are left a free hand. Mr. R. W. Leyland, the well-known Liverpool shipowner, will perhaps be more interested than anybody else in the fate of the union, for it is practically his creation.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Can the Senator state how long that combination has been in existence?

Mr. LODGE. The circular is dated the 1st of June, 1904, and the circular letter says: "Referring to your entry into this union." So I suppose that it was being formed about that time.

Mr. MALLORY. Has the Senator stated in the course of his remarks where he gets the information he has given us?

Mr. LODGE. This was taken from a trade paper—I have not the name of it here—which gives the committee and the rules; and this is a copy of the circular that came into the possession of our Commission. The rules were printed in an English trade paper.

The object of the union is to control the grain rates of the world by means of this combination of sailing vessels.

Mr. President, that is the most recent illustration of the difficulties with which we have to contend in trying to secure a share of our foreign carrying trade. It is one which I should think would bring home to our farmers and to the exporters of our grain, which is an enormous interest, the advisability of building up the American merchant marine in such a way as to furnish competition in the matter of freight rates upon their great product.

But, Mr. President, that is only one of the obstacles we have had to meet. It is only one of the results which has come from a neglect of the shipping interest of the United States. The system of the United States has been a protective system, and whatever system is adopted by a Government ought to be uniform throughout. If we are to have what is called the "free-trade system"—that is, a system of tariff for revenue only—it should be free trade for everybody. If it is to be a protective system, it should be protection for everybody.

We have had a protective system which has covered every American interest, every American industry, every form of American labor except the interest of the shipowner and of the man who sails the ship. If we were on a free-trade basis, we could defend that position. We should say: "You must take your chances in the markets of the world as everyone else in the country does." But we shut them out from the chances if there are any which free trade would give them. We throw around everything in this country the shield of protection, very wisely, as I believe, and we leave the sailor and the shipowner alone outside, leave them in a position a thousand times worse than it would be if it was all free trade for everyone, because they alone are discriminated against both at home and abroad. They alone since the civil war have had no help whatever from the Government. We have protected the shipbuilder. We have never done anything to help the shipowner. We have left him and the sailor and the master and the fisherman all alike exposed to the competition of all the nations of the world. And not only that, we have not left them to competition where all enter on an equality. We have left them to struggle in the markets of the entire world with rivals who have been protected by their governments in the highest degree. England has reversed our system. She has given up protection of every industry but one, and that one is the industry of the shipowner and the ship manager, the sailor, and the sea captain. England has held that it was not only unprofitable, but, with a queer lack of humor and a strange indifference to facts, that it was immoral to protect by duties her farmer or her operative, but she has never failed to give protection of the most direct and flagrant kind to her shipping. It was but the other day that she made a huge gift of $20,000,000 to a single steamship company. From her merchant ships her protection has never been withdrawn.

The merchant marine has had an advantage in England over every other industry and over every other form of employment. If it has not been done by the indirect method of the tariff, it has been done by insurance discriminations, by port and light dues, by heavy subsidies and subventions. On an average, England has been paying three to four million dollars a year since 1830 to aid her shipping and to encourage her people to start foreign lines; while our people have been left, not to take an even chance in the markets of the world, but to meet a world competition, which is bounty fed, aided by subventions, and helped by government in every possible way that human ingenuity can devise.

In Germany not only are subventions given, but Germany regulates all the freight rates of the Empire by land, so as to benefit her own shipping. We are the only first-class nation in the world which leaves its commerce on the seas unprotected, unaided, and defenseless. The miserable result of such neglect has been the destruction of our merchant marine.

It is not, Mr. President, just, and it has always seemed to me to be the very height of injustice to select one single industry and leave it to compete alone in a world of protective tariffs, a world which, so far as shipping is concerned, is filled with rivals encouraged, stimulated, and upheld in every way by the direct bounties of the government.

As you, Mr. President [Mr. GALLINGER in the chair], are well aware, I went upon the Merchant Marine Commission, which held hearings in all parts of the country and over which you, sir, presided so ably, believing, after many years of experience here with different bills, that we ought to return to our old system of tariff discrimination. I was absolutely convinced, and convinced against my will, by the investigations we made that tariff discrimination was out of the question to-day as a means of aiding our merchant marine. It appeared in testimony beyond a peradventure—I will not undertake to read from the reports—that it was the most expensive method. It also appeared that we should be obliged, if we adopted tariff discrimination, to abrogate clauses in more than thirty treaties, which would mean the dislocation of our trade relations for the time being with some thirty countries. Of course, it could be done; we could denounce those treaties or that clause in them; but to do so would at once upset our relations with all those countries.

It became also equally obvious that the situation had changed since the days when we discriminated in favor of American tonnage. At that time our exports and imports were very nearly balanced; generally the balance of trade was adverse. We were an importing country in the early days of the nineteenth century, and for many years after the early days. Our industrial system was in its infancy. We had to buy almost all our manufactured goods from Europe. All that has been completely changed. To-day the balance of trade is enormously in our favor, and it has been turned permanently in our favor by the great export of American manufactures which has developed in the last ten years.

Therefore, Mr. President, if we abrogate these treaties and invite retaliation, instead of having the advantage in such a contest, as we did in the beginning of the Government, we should be at an absolute disadvantage, because we are selling a great deal more than we buy.

Moreover, Mr. President, in order to make a tariff discrimination effective it would be necessary to take a large number of articles now on the free list and put duties upon them. That, I think, in most cases would be very unwise, and I do not believe it is a method of encouraging shipping which would be or ought to be acceptable to the country.

Therefore we are thrown back inexorably upon the system which the rest of the world has pursued and is pursuing to-day—the method of direct help to the shipping interest by giving subventions or bounties or aid in the form of a mail subsidy.

There are two methods of doing this. There is what may be called the English method, which consists in giving a large mail subsidy, which is a pure gift, for the mere business cost of carrying the mails does not enter into it. It is only nominal. This scheme consists of mail subsidies offered to fast ships. The English theory is that if you build up a line of steamships by offering a mail subsidy for the fast mail carriers they will get the line established, and the English houses will go to the point in the foreign country where they have regular steam communication, and then as the business grows the slow freighter will follow in behind and the great line will gradually be developed. The English system has worked extremely well. It has worked exactly as they anticipated it would in the great majority of cases. We have adopted that system in regard to the lines specified in the bill.

But there is another system in vogue which may be called the "French system," of general subventions to all vessels engaged in commerce, and that, in view of the depression of our own merchant marine, is also embodied in this bill for the benefit of vessels, both sail and steam, which do not and can not carry mails.

We ask, as a valuable consideration for this bounty or subvention, that the crews shall contain a certain number of Americans; that the ships shall train boys for the naval service, and that a certain proportion of their crews and officers shall constitute a naval reserve. The consideration is a very real one, for we need above all things a naval reserve. Our difficulty of late years has been in filling the ranks of our seamen in the Navy of the United States. It has been very difficult to recruit enough men properly to man our ships of war, and in time of war and stress it is also very important to have a body of men from whom we can draw seamen to fight our battles. One of the prime objects of this bill is to meet that demand and gradually to build up a great body of American seamen who are attached officially and by name to the naval reserve of the Government and to whom the Government can go when it especially needs sailors. It is on this same basis that we have included the fishing industries of the United States.

To-day the ocean mail service of the United States yields in round numbers about $2,000,000, and if the change in port and light dues, which we suggest is finally incorporated in the bill, we shall get probably from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 additional revenue from that source. In other words, we ask only that the Government give to American shipping the profit which the Government now makes in carrying the ocean mails, and that it shall arrange the light and port dues so that they will yield another two millions, which will give us sufficient money to pay all these bounties and subventions if averaged over a term of ten years.

I think, Mr. President, that is a very modest and moderate request. In raising the light and port dues we are simply raising them from the lowest point in the world. Not content with leaving our shipping and our sailors unprotected against all the rivalry of foreign nations, we have reduced our light and port dues to the lowest point imposed by any nation, so as, apparently, to invite foreign nations to come and take the American carrying trade.

Mr. President, the bill is a very reasonable and a very moderate one. I should like it better myself if it went much further, but I believe it will suffice to turn the tide of depression which is rapidly overwhelming all that is left of the American merchant marine. It is not necessary for me to dwell upon the importance of the merchant marine to the whole country. We are now putting, it is estimated, nearly $200,000,000 into the pockets of foreigners to carry our own products. It seems to me that to a great and enterprising nation like the United States that is in the highest degree discreditable. That money ought to be paid to our own people, but it never will be if you leave them defenseless before the artificially encouraged competition of the rest of the world.

This is not a mere question of advantage and assistance to the interests which lie along our ocean coasts. It may not be as obvious to those who dwell in the interior as it is to those of us who live either on the shores of the Pacific or of the Atlantic. But it is in the interest of every man in the United States who is interested in our agriculture or our industries that we should have a great merchant marine, able to save us from such foreign combinations and syndicates as the one I have described, able to take our own freight and carry it across the ocean, and keep in American pockets the vast sums of money now paid to foreigners. We have been enabled to compete in the markets of the world by our system of railroads with which we have covered the entire face of the United States. The genius with which those railroads have been managed, the low rates of freight, the speed with which that freight has been carried, constitute the great element to-day that enables us to enter into foreign markets.

But the system is incomplete until we can cover the ocean with American steamship lines as we have covered the Continent with American railroads. Our share of the foreign markets will be ever in peril until we do. I do not think myself that there is any more deserving industry or any more deserving class of men than those who go down to the sea in ships. But I am sorry to say it is my experience in the years I have served here and in the other House that when these bills come forward they are treated by too many of the Senators and Representatives as if these seamen and shipowners were little better than highwaymen who are coming in here to extort a great gift at the expense of the American people.

Their industry, Mr. President, is just as dear to them, and just as honest and as valuable an industry as any other. The plea I make for them is the plea of simple justice. If you are going to protect the maker of sugar, the maker of cotton cloths, and the maker of all the countless products which our industries turn out from year to year, it is gross injustice to leave the man who wants to sail your ship and carry a part at least of all your great freights not only absolutely without protection, but at a hopeless disadvantage, because all the other nations of the world protect heavily and effectively their shipping and their seamen.

I hope, Mr. President, that this bill, which has been the fruit of a great deal of thought and labor and pains, will be given a favorable consideration by the Senate and by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 339.

Mr. GALLINGER. If no other Senator is prepared to proceed with the discussion of the unfinished business, I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course I do not propose to object to the consideration of the bill which the Senator from Texas wishes to call up, but I will make the observation that we have been in session a good many weeks and I think have only once gone to the Calendar. I hope, after the Senator's bill is passed, we may spend an hour or so on the Calendar to-day.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT WORTH, TEX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 339, which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 339) to provide for the enlargement and improvement of the public building at Fort Worth, Tex., and by unanimous consent the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty," and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract for, secure, and cause to be erected and constructed upon the site now owned by the United States in the city of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, and upon part of which is situated the public building of the United States, suitable improvements, enlargements, and additions to said public building, or upon said public building site, together with such fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and all other necessary equipments and appointments, for the use and accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, the circuit court of appeals, and the United States post-office, in said city of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, the cost of which said improvements, enlargements, and additions shall not exceed the sum of $325,000; which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for said purpose, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPURE AND UNWHOLESOME TEA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is in order.

The bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the bill considered. It has been passed over four times now, I think. There is not any reason I know of why it should not be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar is under consideration under Rule VIII, and when objection is made the bill will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CAPE GIRARDEAU, MO.

Mr. STONE. Before taking up the Calendar I desire to ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 646) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Cape Girardeau, in the State of Missouri. There is a Federal court held at Cape Girardeau without any accommodation for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not object to the Senator's bill, but after it has been considered I shall insist upon the regular order, which will be the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, the United States post-office, and other governmental offices in the city of Cape Girardeau and State of Missouri, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, to strike out, from line 18 to line 14 on page 3, the following words:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PUBLIC PARK ON GEORGETOWN HEIGHTS.

The bill (S. 54) to provide a public park on Georgetown Heights, in the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FORMATION OF COMPANIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1244) to amend section 605 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia relating to corporations, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 605 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia by striking out the proviso contained therein, so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 605. CERTIFICATE.—Any three or more persons who desire to form a company for the purpose of carrying on any enterprise or business which may be lawfully conducted by an individual, excepting banks of circulation or discount, railroads, and such other enterprise or business as may be otherwise specially provided for in this code, may make, sign, and acknowledge, before some officer competent to take the acknowledgment of deeds, and file in the office of the recorder of deeds a certificate in writing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

The bill (S. 1539) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill may be passed over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over for the present.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The bill (S. 1540) to increase the efficiency of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Ordnance Department shall consist of 1 chief of ordnance, with the rank of brigadier-general; 6 colonels, 9 lieutenant-colonels, 19 majors, 25 captains, 25 first lieutenants, and the enlisted men, including ordnance sergeants, as now authorized by law. Vacancies in the grades of colonel and lieutenant-colonel shall hereafter be filled by promotion, according to seniority, and the chief of ordnance shall be selected from the permanent officers of the corps for a period of four years.

SEC. 2. That the vacancies occurring in the grades of captain and first lieutenant of ordnance shall be filled by detail from the Army at large, from the same grade or the grade below, for four years, after which no officer shall again be eligible for detail until he has served one year out of the department: Provided, That no officer shall be so detailed except upon the recommendation of a board of officers and after at least one examination, which shall be open to competition.

SEC. 3. That vacancies occurring in the grade of major of ordnance, after promotion as now prescribed by law, of all permanent officers of lower grade now in the Ordnance Department shall be filled by appointment of officers of the grade next below, who shall have served by detail in the Ordnance Department, the selection to be made as the result of the recommendation of a board of ordnance officers, approved by the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS OF MOROCCO.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution submitted by Mr. BACON on the 8th instant requesting the President to furnish the Senate with copies of papers relating to the holding of a conference on matters relative to Morocco, etc.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand that anyone has objected to the consideration of the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire the resolution went over.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: I am informed by the Senator from New Hampshire that he will withdraw his objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will. I had an impression that it had been abandoned; but if the Senator wishes to have it considered I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. BACON. Oh, it has not been at all abandoned. Of course I am not in a position to have it passed unless the Senators on the other side agree to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that it is necessary to read more than the title, and then Senators can determine whether it is to be passed or not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution requesting the President to furnish the Senate with copies of papers relating to the holding of a conference on matters relative to Morocco, etc.

Mr. ALDRICH. We could hardly discuss that, I think, under the existing rule.

Mr. BACON. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. We can hardly discuss the resolution under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BACON. I do not want to discuss it; I simply want to have it passed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall have to object.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Rhode Island does not object?

Mr. ALDRICH. I object.

Mr. BACON. I wish to say that it will all be put in the newspapers, and we might as well have it officially.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN RHODE ISLAND.

The bill (S. 284) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Rhode Island was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, accept, in lieu of the written guaranty required to accompany a proposal for naval supplies, and in lieu of the bond required for the faithful performance of a contract for furnishing such supplies, a certified check, payable to the order of the Secretary of the Navy, for from 25 to 50 per cent of the amount of such proposal or contract, the check to be held by the Secretary of the Navy until the requirements of the proposal or contract shall be complied with and as a guaranty for compliance with the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOMES IN IDAHO AND WYOMING.

The bill (S. 577) granting to the State of Idaho 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Idaho State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], I think, objected to the bill the other day, and as he is absent I will object to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 608) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a similar bill. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FRENCH TRANSATLANTIC CABLE COMPANY.

The bill (S. 2872) for the relief of the French Trans-Atlantic Cable Company was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. Was not this bill discussed at the last session?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was, slightly.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

REORGANIZATION OF CONSULAR SERVICE.

The bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LODGE. That bill has been up and has been read, and all the committee amendments have been adopted. It is a unanimous report. I am not aware that there is any objection to it in its present form.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations have been agreed to.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I called attention the other day to what I thought was an error in classing the consul at Monterey as a consulship, whereas in fact, as I understand, the appropriation acts described his office as a consul-generalship.

Mr. LODGE. The consul at Monterey is reported as a consul. He is placed in the bill at an increased salary over what he has now. There was no intention to change his rank. The classification follows the classification furnished by the State Department. I looked it up myself. If there is any change, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, it can be easily remedied in the House or in conference.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That will be very satisfactory.

Mr. LODGE. I assure him I will see that it is remedied if there is any mistake. There was no desire to cut down anybody's rank.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the bill is a unanimous report from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. LODGE. It has the unanimous report of that committee.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that I understand the Senator from Massachusetts correctly. I understood that the classification, which, of course, both he and I know, came from the State Department, reclassified practically all of the consulates and provided for a certain number of consuls-general and a certain number of consuls, and so forth, and in countries having more than one consul-general, if I recollect correctly, the number was reduced to one. Am I correct?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. This is not one of those cases. This is the case of the consul at Monterey, Mexico.

Mr. BACON. And there is no other consul-general in Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; there is another consul-general. The Senator from Iowa was of the opinion that Monterey had been a consulate-general. The report of the State Department is that it is now a consulate, and it has not been changed by the bill. If it has been changed, I assure the Senator from Iowa that all those things shall be remedied.

Mr. BACON. I made the inquiry because I did not fully understand what the Senator had said.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGISTRY OF REPAIRED FOREIGN WRECKS.

The Commissioner of Navigation may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the word "determine," to strike out "on or before the date when, the plans for such vessel being finished, proposals for building said vessel are invited by advertisement" and insert "within sixty days from its commencement;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be constructed a steam tender for the engineer service of the twelfth light-house district, at a cost not to exceed $135,000, and the Light-House Board is authorized to employ temporarily at Washington three draftsmen, to be paid at current rates, to prepare the plans for the said steam tender; such draftsmen to be paid from the appropriation for building said vessel; such employment to cease and determine within sixty days from its commencement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be constructed a steam tender for the use of the light-house inspector of the twelfth light-house district, at a cost not to exceed $130,000, and the Light-House board is authorized to employ temporarily at Washington three draftsmen, to be paid at current rates, to prepare the plans for the said steam tender; such draftsmen to be paid from the appropriation for building said vessel; such employment to cease and determine within sixty days from its commencement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. A moment ago we passed a bill providing for the construction of two steam vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service for duty on Puget Sound, and now this bill provides for a third.

Mr. FRYE. The bill now pending provides for a regular revenue cutter, while the two vessels authorized in the bill to which

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: A moment ago I objected to the bill (S. 952) to authorize a patent to be issued to Stephen Teichner for certain lands therein described. I wish to withdraw the objection. It is not the bill I supposed it was.

Mr. NELSON. The bill went over on objection of the Senator from Colorado. He has examined it and has found that he has no objection to it, and I ask that it may be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE, BLOCK ISLAND, R. I.

The Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. CRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, on January 11, 1906, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made and estimates to be submitted with a view to securing a greater navigable depth and a larger anchorage area at the harbor of refuge, Block Island, R. I.

COOS BAY AND BAR, OREGON.

The Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Commerce, on January 11, 1906, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of Coos Bay and bar, Oregon, with a view to widening and deepening the entrance to said bay to a depth of 40 feet at mean low tide, and to submit a plan and estimate for such improvement.

The Secretary of War is also authorized and directed to cause an investigation to be made as to the present commerce of said Coos Bay, and the commercial resources of the country tributary thereto, and report the same to Congress.

That the expense of such survey and investigation be paid out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of the entrance to said Coos Bay and harbor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], who originally offered the resolution, that I doubt very much whether a concurrent resolution can change an appropriation made by Congress. I think it will have to be a joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. It can not be done otherwise.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that resolution ought to be a joint resolution, if the Senator expects it to become effective.

Mr. FULTON. I am not familiar with the rule in that regard. I submitted the resolution to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who advised me that it was sufficient.

Mr. FRYE. But the Senator from Maine evidently did not see that it contained an appropriation. It must be a joint resolution if it carries an appropriation of money.

Mr. ALDRICH. It changes an existing appropriation.

Mr. FRYE. The concurrent resolution can be changed in a minute to a joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the concurrent resolution will be changed to a joint resolution, and in that form the Chair now lays it before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 27) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of Coos Bay and bar, Oregon.

Rogers, pay director, United States Navy, $1,000 in full for all losses of personal property incurred by him by reason of the destruction by fire of the Windsor House, at Yokohama, Japan, on the morning of February 8, 1886.

Mr. MALLORY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. BLACKBURN on the 16th instant. The entire report is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2262) for the relief of Pay Director E. B. Rogers, United States Navy, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following communication received in reply to a request for the views of the Department on a like bill which was favorably reported from the committee and passed the Senate in the Fifty-eighth Congress:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 21, 1904.

SIR: In response to the request contained in your letter of the 8th instant for the views of the Department upon the bill (S. 4778) for the relief of Pay Inspector E. B. Rogers, United States Navy, I have the honor to state that the Department recommends that the bill in question be favorably reported by the committee.

A measure identical in terms was, on the 17th instant, favorably reported to the House of Representatives by the Committee on Claims (H. R. 13366 and House Report No. 1682) and, as embodying in convenient form the circumstances connected with the losses sustained by Pay Inspector Rogers, attention is invited to the report submitted by the committee above mentioned.

In this connection attention is further invited to the fact that an act was passed on February 5, 1903 (32 Stat. L., 1600), authorizing the payment of $4,000 to Paymaster James E. Tolfree to reimburse said officer for losses sustained in the fire in which Pay Inspector Rogers lost his personal property.

Very respectfully, W. H. MOODY, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

[House Report No. 1682, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred to bill (H. R. 13366) for the relief of Pay Inspector E. B. Rogers, United States Navy, having considered the same, beg leave to report that a bill of like character for the relief of Pay Inspector J. E. Tolfree, United States Navy, became a law at the last session of Congress, and that a like bill for the relief of Pay Clerk Charles Blake, United States Navy, has at this sesison passed the Senate and been favorably reported by your committee. Inasmuch as Pay Inspector Rogers suffered a like loss, your committee recommend the passage of the bill for his relief.

The committee submits the following communications as its report on said bill:

UNITED STATES NAVAL HOSPITAL,
Yokohama, Japan, February 10, 1886.

SIR: I regret to report that on the 8th instant, at about 4.30 a. m., the Windsor Hotel, in which I had established my office and was living at the time, caught fire and was burned to the ground. With the exception of such clothes as I was enabled to put on after discovering the fire, I saved no property, either personal or public, and, as it was, barely escaped with life. I had secured my cash box, pay roll, and cashbook, and some of my own and my wife's property, and carried them out on the veranda adjoining my rooms on the second floor, but was almost immediately compelled by flame and smoke to abandon everything, and it required my entire energies to save my own and wife's lives. I passed through the full length of the long building, carrying and dragging my wife, creeping most of the time on hands and knees to keep my nostrils in the cool air under the scorching smoke, falling downstairs, and finally reaching the street.

From the time I first knew of the fire until I reached the outer door was not more than ten minutes, at very liberal estimate, so terrible was the rapidity of the fire, and the whole of the large structure was in flames within a half an hour. I did my best, under the circumstances, to secure the Government property and papers, and that I was the last, or at least the last but one, to leave the burning building, and saved none of my own or my wife's property, except the clothes we had put on and my watch, which was in my vest pocket, losing absolutely my entire possessions, shows the narrowness of my escape. The Government property burned was as follows:

1. The entire supply of stationery, books, and blanks, valued at about $60.

2. Three packages of charts addressed to the commanding officers of the Monocacy, Alert, and Palos, which formed portion of a shipment leaving London November 8, 1885.

3. Two entire parcels or packages of charts for the ships of the Asiatic Station, shipped from London—one on December 6, 1885, and the other on December 20, 1885. (These dates furnished by agents of French Mail Line.)

4. My pay roll, cashbook, and cash box.

The balance due the United States as per account current for fourth quarter, 1885, was (omitting cents) $4,061. At present writing I have in hand $2,785.11 in cash. I can account for and furnish vouchers for $1,100.19 paid since January 1, 1886, leaving $172.69 unaccounted for, but in this sum are included several dollars in postage stamps and about $6 paid for official postage, the items of which I can not recall.

A few hours after the fire I reported to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury that my loss in cash was about $150, and my subsequent investigation nearly bears out that statement.

My personal loss I estimate at upward of $1,000.

As soon as possible (at 7 a. m. February 8) I made a search among the ruins for my cash box, and recovered melted and disfigured remnants of coin in value about $12, which is the property of the Government.

I have the honor, therefore, to ask at your hands such action as you may deem necessary to determine my accountability.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. B. ROGERS,
Assistant Paymaster, U. S. Navy.

JOHN LEE DAVIS,
Rear-Admiral, Commanding U. S. Naval Force on Asiatic Station, U. S. Flagship Trenton, Yokohama, Japan.

CLUB HOTEL,
Yokohama, Japan, February 12, 1886.

SIR: Having been appointed by Rear-Admiral John Lee Davis, United States Navy, commanding United States naval forces, Asiatic Station, as senior member of a board of investigation to inquire into the losses of Government property resulting from the burning of the Windsor House on the morning of the 8th of February, 1886, you will please hold yourself in readiness to report on board the Trenton on Monday, the 15th instant, or at an earlier day if it can be arranged.

Please inform me where a communication will reach you.

Very respectfully,

JAMES E. TOLFREE,
Paymaster, U. S. Navy.

Asst. Paymaster E. B. ROGERS, U. S. Navy.

A true copy.

E. B. ROGERS,
Pay Inspector, U. S. Navy.

U. S. FLAGSHIP TRENTON, 2D RATE,
Yokohama, Japan, February 15, 1886.

SIR: In obedience to your order of February 12, 1886, we have held a strict and careful investigation of the particulars relating to the loss by the destruction of the Windsor Hotel on the morning of the 8th instant of Government property in charge of Asst. Paymaster E. B. Rogers, United States Navy, and have the honor to report as follows:

Assistant Paymaster Rogers had his office and residence in the Windsor Hotel, regarded as one of the best in Yokohama.

On the morning of the 8th instant, a few minutes after 4 o'clock, the hotel was found to be on fire, a fresh wind prevailing at the time, and the flames spread with such rapidity that all efforts to save the building were unavailing.

Assistant Paymaster Rogers was awakened by the smell of smoke, and hurriedly throwing on his clothes succeeded in getting his cash box, pay roll, and a few clothes to the side veranda immediately outside of his room as the flames were bursting through the ceiling. At this time the smoke came in such volumes—occasioned by the fall of the front veranda and a part of the roof over it—that Assistant Paymaster Rogers was obliged to abandon everything he had collected and think only of saving his life and that of his wife, which he barely succeeded in doing, crawling most the way to the staircase on his hands and knees, and being one of the very last to escape from the building.

A careful inquiry into all the circumstances connected with the fire establishes the fact that only those guests whose rooms were to windward and in close proximity to the main staircase succeeded in saving anything, and these only a few light articles.

The loss of Government property appears to be as follows:

Paymaster's stationery, books, and blanks, estimated value, $60.

Cash, $172.69.

One package of charts for each of the following-named ships, viz, Monocacy, Alert, and Palos, sent from London November 8, 1885.

Two large packages of charts for ships of squadron, sent from London December 6, 1885, and December 20, 1885, respectively.

Seven packages containing China Sea directories for distribution.

All accounts of paymaster's office and papers relating to same.

We find, therefore, that these losses of Government property occurred by the destruction by fire of the Windsor Hotel above mentioned, a newspaper account of which is respectfully inclosed. It also appears to us by careful investigation that Assistant Paymaster Rogers should be relieved from all blame, he having exercised such diligence in guarding the Government property as a prudent man would in protecting his own.

Very respectfully,

JAMES E. TOLFREE,
Paymaster, U. S. Navy.
WM. T. SWINBURNE,
Lieutenant, U. S. Navy.
W. W. GILPATRICK,
Lieutenant, U. S. Navy.

Rear-Admiral JOHN LEE DAVIS,
Commanding United States Naval Force on Asiatic Station.

I certify this to be a true copy of the original report.

A. G. BERRY,
Lieutenant and Secretary to the Commander in Chief.

Pay Inspector, U. S. Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 21, 1886.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 22d of March last, inclosing a copy of the report of a board of officers appointed by Rear-Admiral John L. Davis, United States Navy, for the purpose of inquiring into the loss of certain Government property by the destruction of the Windsor House, at Yokohama, Japan, in February last, and requesting the Department's approval of the claim which you propose to present to Congress, amounting to $1,000, for compensation for the loss of your personal effects at that time.

In reply I have to inform you that in the event of a bill being introduced into Congress for your relief, on account of the losses sustained by you under the circumstances stated, the Department will furnish the committee having the bill in charge, if requested to do so, with such recommendation as the facts in the case may warrant.

Very respectfully,

W. C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

EUSTACE B. ROGERS,
Pay Inspector, United States Navy.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of March, 1904.

[SEAL.] JOHN HAY GILBERT,
Notary Public.

Mr. MALLORY. If I understand the report, there was a fire in a hotel at which this gentleman lost his effects. If that is so, it seems to me it is rather an extraordinary procedure to reimburse him for his effects lost in a hotel fire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That the fire occurred in a hotel is obvious from the face of the report.

Mr. BACON. I hope whoever reported the bill will give us some explanation on the subject.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] reported the bill.

Mr. BACON. He is absent. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place.

JEANIE R. BARTLETT.

The bill (S. 2073) for the relief of Jeanie R. Bartlett, widow of the late Rear-Admiral John Russell Bartlett, United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the beneficiary the difference of pay between captain and rear-admiral in the Navy from the date of her husband's promotion, February 10, 1903, to the date of his death.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOFFMAN ENGINEERING AND CONTRACTING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1648) for the relief of the Hoffman Engineering and Contracting Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to adjudicate and settle the account of the company, and pay the same in an amount not exceeding $12,727.81, out of any moneys heretofore appropriated for the construction of cadet quarters and other buildings at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER subsequently said: I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the preamble was agreed to and Senate bill 1648 was passed. I shall not ask the Senate to act upon the motion now, but I should like to enter it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is entered.

NAVAL AND MARINE CORPS MEDALS.

The bill (S. 697) providing for the award of medals of honor to certain officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

MODELS OF NAVAL VESSELS.

The bill (S. 90) providing for the deposit of a model of any vessel of war of the United States Navy bearing the name of a State of the United States in the capitol building of said State, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be constructed a fully completed model of each vessel of war of the Navy of the United States which now has or may hereafter be given the name borne by any State of the United States, the model to be deposited in the capitol building of said State. The model shall not cease to be, when so deposited, the property of the Government of the United States, but shall be at all times subject to the authority and direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me there ought to be some limit of cost on these models.

Mr. LODGE. It is stated in the report.

Mr. ALLISON. But it ought to be fixed in the bill. There ought to be a limit of cost on the models. Otherwise one model will cost a large sum and another a very little sum.

[a] Reimbursement for the item "Civilian clothes," $363.50, is not covered by the bill, the amount thereof being $1,000 only.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Navy Department has taken this matter up and made an estimate of the probable cost, and from a recent conversation which I have had with the largest shipbuilding concern in the country—in fact, the Cramps—I am led to believe it will add nothing at all to the future cost of the vessels; that is, the contract price will not be augmented by the fact that there will be two models instead of one. One is now deposited in the national capital.

Mr. ALLISON. I am aware of that.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been recommended that, as an educational measure the interior States—in fact, all the States—shall have in their capitol a duplicate model of the ship bearing their name, in order that the people other than those on the seacoast may know what a battle ship looks like.

Mr. ALLISON. I know very well the purpose, as stated by the Senator from Idaho, and I have tried for several years to secure for my State a model of the ship named after Iowa——

Mr. HEYBURN. There is one model.

Mr. ALLISON. And I have been told it could not be done for less than $5,000.

Mr. LODGE. It is stated in the report at $3,500.

Mr. PERKINS. The highest estimate before the committee of a battle-ship model was $3,500.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move that that be the limit of cost of any one of the models.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that it may result, if that amendment is made, in our not receiving the benefit of free models in the future. They would take that as the minimum price.

Mr. LODGE. In the report an estimate of the total cost is given:

Type of vessel.	Cost.	Time.
		Months.
Battle ships	$3,500	8
Cruisers	3,500	8
Monitors	2,000	3
Gunboats	2,000	3
Torpedo boats, etc	900	1

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert "at a cost of not exceeding $3,500."

Mr. LODGE. Yes; "no model to cost more than $3,500."

Mr. ALLISON. Yes. I am in entire sympathy with the bill, but I think there ought to be a limit of cost.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be inserted after the word "view," in line 10.

The SECRETARY. After the word "view," in line 10, it is proposed to insert "no model to cost in excess of $3,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIREMENT OF PETTY OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN OF THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 1649) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the Navy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in computing the necessary thirty years' time for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the Navy all service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall be credited.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXISTING STATUS IN SANTO DOMINGO.

Senate resolution 39, requesting the President to give information to the Senate regarding the existing status in Santa Domingo, etc., submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 4th instant, was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BLUEFIELD, W. VA.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SCOTT. One moment. I have stayed here all afternoon, and I have a bill which it will take but a moment to pass.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad the Senator has been here all day.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 102) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Bluefield, W. Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be erected upon the site already selected and purchased by him in the city of Bluefield, W. Va., a building to be used as a post-office building, as a place for holding United States courts, and for other purposes of the Federal Government, the building complete not to exceed in cost the sum of $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT CAPE FLATTERY, WASHINGTON.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 928) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station in the vicinity of Cape Flattery, or Flattery Rocks, on the coast of Washington. It is in the vicinity where the wreck of the Valencia occurred a few days ago, and there is very great necessity for the station.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to establish a life-saving station in the vicinity of Cape Flattery, or Flattery Rocks, on the coast of Washington, at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ALLISON. For morning business only.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator be good enough to allow me to ask unanimous consent to have Senate bill 1894 considered, which is a very short bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I have agreed to yield, if I yield at all, to the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], and then I will yield to the Senator from Nevada. After that I shall insist on my motion to go into executive session.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2544) to amend the act of Congress approved April 21, 1904, entitled "An act to amend section 17 of the act of Congress approved June 6, 1902, entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.'"

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to make provision for a Federal building in keeping with the needs of the public service at Los Angeles, Cal., the act of Congress approved April 21, 1904, is hereby so far amended as to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Federal building site, being lots 16, 17, 18, and 19, in block C, Rivera and Vignola tract, at the southeast corner of Main and Winston streets in said city, at such time and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, and to apply the net proceeds thereof toward the erection of the new Federal building to be erected upon the site which has been donated by the citizens of Los Angeles, and the limit of the cost of said new Federal building is hereby increased by an amount equal to the net proceeds derived from the sale of the old Federal building site herein described.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCOUNTS OF P. S. CORBETT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1894) for the relief of P. S. Corbett.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the accounts of P. S. Corbett, formerly United States marshal for the State of Nevada, be readjusted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the said Secretary is hereby directed to allow and credit to the said Corbett, under the head of "Fees and expenses of marshal's United States courts, 1883 and 1884," the sum of $1,533.64 now charged against said Corbett on the books of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the Senator from Nevada make some explanation of the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that it is a bill for the relief of P. S. Corbett, United States marshal for Nevada in 1882. Corbett is dead, and there is only one surviving bondsman, Peter Dalton, a man of advanced years, who has lived long in Nevada, and it would very seriously embarrass him if the suit were enforced.

In reference to the merits of the matter, I will state that these were extraordinary expenses incurred by the United States marshal under the order of Attorney-General Brewster, requiring him to make every effort to apprehend George E. Spencer, formerly a United States Senator, who was then in Nevada. Attorney-General Brewster recommended the allowances, but these particular items were disallowed by the Comptroller as not authorized by law. The Senate of the United States has passed a similar bill for his relief three or four times.

Mr. SPOONER. Was any suit ever brought by the Government on his bond?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Suit has been pending for years, and it has been put off from year to year by the Solicitor-General on the suggestion that relief would be given by Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 31, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, corrected, and approved.

FURTHER TIME TO PRINT REMARKS ON STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. BEALL of Texas] be allowed ten days' further time than the time already allowed for the purpose of printing remarks on the statehood bill. This request is made on account of the illness of my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague be allowed ten days' further time in which to print remarks on the statehood bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 12987. Preliminary to that, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this bill shall be confined to the subject-matter, and that all gentlemen speaking on the bill may have five legislative days after the conclusion of the debate in which to extend their remarks on the bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate upon this bill be confined to the subject-matter of the bill, and that five legislative days be granted to Members generally to print remarks on the bill after it has been acted upon. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would have no objection to the gentleman's request save for the limitation which he makes that remarks in the Committee of the Whole must be confined to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is a proper request. There is a great demand on the part of Members for time to discuss this bill, and I am sure that every moment that we probably would have, even if it extended a week, would be legitimately used in the discussion of subjects germane to the bill, and therefore I thought it wise to make this request, that we should not have these discursions into the entire domain of possible debate. We have appropriation bills that will immediately follow this, upon which this other class of debate may be indulged in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The only manner in which a Member of this House frequently can get opportunity to discuss a subject which he wishes to discuss is on some other sort of a bill. I will object to the request with that limitation in it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that all general debate upon this bill be confined to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that can not be done without changing the rules of the House, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEPBURN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no rule of this House that allows the class of debate that the gentleman has reference to. That is simply an abuse of the rules of the House—one that has been indulged in for a long time, I admit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That matter has been ruled on by the Speaker before.

The SPEAKER. And yet if there be no rule of the House, this would make a rule.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir, I submit to you that under the common law of parliamentary usage, germaneness may always be insisted upon in debate, in every other body that I know of except this one; but there has grown up a sort of custom here that allows this abuse, and therefore I think——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to make one suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa. I have no objection to the Chair ruling on the point of order, however. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, I should like to make this suggestion. Generally, I think that his position is right, that when matters of legislation are up in this House debate should be confined to enlightening people thereon, but very often a gentleman who is conscientiously endeavoring to address himself to the subject before the House makes diversions and digressions which occur to him at the moment to be cognate to the subject under discussion, and it is annoying for a gentleman under those circumstances to be interrupted by Members getting up and calling him to order when he does not intend to continue in any such diversion for more than the moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then; but, if the Speaker would indulge me, I wanted to say that if this precedent is set after a while we will become a body that can not even talk. We are a body now that can not do anything except talk if we are not wanted to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to abridge any of the gentleman's privileges, and therefore I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In equal kindness the gentleman ought to withdraw it upon my suggestion, as it would cut off most of his high privileges.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the motion. As many as are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 12987—the railroad-rate bill—will say "aye," those opposed "no."

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the railroad-rate bill (H. R. 12987), with Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the railroad-rate bill (H. R. 12987), which the Clerk will read.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a question of information. A great many Members do not understand how many days this debate is to run, and I want everybody to know.

Mr. HEPBURN. There has been no limit to the debate, but it has been suggested that probably we would try to reach a vote one week from to-day.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, for the second time the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives presents a bill to the Congress and the country intended to amend the present interstate-commerce law, in response to a demand from the people for a larger and more satisfactory regulation of interstate carriers by the Government. The bill passed by the House in the Fifty-eighth Congress sought to do two things—first, to invest the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to fix a reasonable and just rate or regulation, after complaint and hearing, in place of one found to be unjust and unreasonable; in fact, to confer by law the power which the Commission actually exercised for the first years of its existence, and until the Supreme Court declared such power had not been conferred by the law of 1887, and, second, to speed the orders of the Commission to a final determination. It was a simple bill, and its friends did not claim that it remedied all existing evils, but they did claim that it would bring great relief to the people, and that it was wise at that time to take one step and from that vantage ground view the situation before taking another. The advocates of that measure knew, or felt they knew, that the requirements of the people would never be less, and that delay would simply increase the demand for more radical railroad legislation.

In an argument to the House on that bill it was stated that "next year the people would demand more than this year," and the carriers were advised not to oppose the measure, for delay was but "storing up wrath against a day of judgment." This remark was printed and circulated throughout the country by some organization formed, presumably, at the instigation and expense of the carriers or favored shippers, with the statement that business interests had been threatened and that disaster was liable to follow. The bill passed the House almost unanimously and was presented to the Senate, whose committee took it in charge and proceeded to have hearings upon it. The President remained firm in his advocacy of the principles of the measure and suggested that he would call the Fifty-ninth Congress in extra session in case the Senate failed to pass a reasonable bill on the subject, but it continued its hearings until the Fifty-eighth Congress expired and then on into the summer.

A year has passed since the prophecy was uttered, and yet business has not been disturbed; railroading has extended its operations, increased its mileage, and improved its facilities and equipments in an almost unprecedented manner, thus furnishing conclusive answer to the carriers' own arguments. To-day we offer a new bill, and I present it to you now, as I did the one of last year, with the statement that it is probably the least the people will accept. It confers wider powers than its predecessor, for the reason that the demand is for a greater exercise of the Government's control over public carriers. It may not remedy every defect in existing laws to which every complainant has called the Commission's attention, but it is believed that it will be sufficient to cure every defect against which any considerable objection is made.

The committee, or at least a majority of it, believes that this bill is not only within the constitutional powers of Congress, but that it is clearly an expression of the duty of Congress to the American people.

Our Government was organized to subserve the general welfare, and no act of any branch of it can be justified on any other theory. Men may differ as to whether any particular measure will serve the best interests of the people, but there can be no difference of opinion among patriots upon any act or condition which, under the sanction or sufferance of law, has but one result, viz, that of serving private or special interests, whether those interests are great or small.

When the fathers established the Government of the United States and adopted the Constitution as its bill of rights they wisely delegated to Congress control over all commerce among the States. At that time there were but thirteen colonies from which States could be made, and they occupied the little territory east of the Alleghenies and in New England. Commerce then was limited, but the means for transportation were so crude that its movements were more difficult than those of to-day. As a legal basis of procedure in the exercise of government the common law was adopted, and that law treated common carriers as public servants and subject to governmental control, and provided that all rates and regulations charged or imposed by them should be just and reasonable.

From the time when man produced more than he consumed and desired other than what he produced, carriers became important. Settlements were made in the New World on the seashores and on the banks of rivers where transportation by water was possible, but each man at first was his own carrier, and he exchanged his for his neighbor's products. With thrift and enterprise a surplus greater than the needs of immediate neighborhood exchanges was created, and the common carrier became a necessity. At first the Government, recognizing the need, entered into the business of carrying products for the benefit of the people; highways were built, boat lines established, and canals dug. These were operated either without charge to the people or by imposing a charge upon the user of the means of transportation. In the early forties the railroad was born, and regions remote from navigable waters were opened up to settlement. Some wild dreamer of the Revolutionary times may have had a vision of the twentieth-century commerce, but such vision was never expressed, and certainly it never entered into the mind of the statesmen of early days what wonderful things were to come to pass. Then wants were simple and desire was modest. The luxuries of yesterday have become necessities of to-day. Inventive genius has revolutionized past ideals and ancient methods; ignorance, superstition, and religious fanaticism and bigotry, which once blocked the way of progress and blinded the eyes of genius, have been ruthlessly crushed to death beneath advancing civilization, which has strengthened with contest and grown wise and audacious with experience, until to-day nothing is sacred but eternal right and nothing impossible to him who wills. [Applause.]

Under such conditions the most progressive Government in the world is required at this time to deal justly and fairly with the transportation problem, justly and fairly to the people and to the carriers—to the people, because the Government exists for them; to the carriers, because, being necessary for the general welfare, they are included in it and an injury to them would be an injury to the people.

This question has been confusing to the public in many respects, due, I believe, to the false notion in the minds of certain railroad representatives and their sympathizers that the interests of the railroads could be best subserved by threats of disaster and persistent misrepresentations.

What is it that the people have asked, and what is the proposed legislation? The relation of the railroads to the public is generally known. The carrier is chartered to perform certain public service. The Federal Government gives it the right to do business among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, under the express provision that it shall not discriminate in its charges and service between individuals, between products, or between places, and that all its charges and regulations shall be just and reasonable. That is now the statutory law. It has always been the common law, and no one, I apprehend, will be bold enough to assert that it is not a good law.

When the country was new the Government encouraged railroad building by giving, in certain instances, vast areas of the public domain, by loans of public moneys, and by other means. States gave similar State aid and individuals contributed of their private funds. The people, through their representatives, recognized the fact that the pioneer railroad builder should be encouraged and that his charges must be necessarily high. When large charges were necessary the Government did not exercise to a great extent its power of regulation. When population was scattered and business small strict regulation was not so imperative. When carrier actually competed with carrier for traffic the shipper did not suffer so much, but when the country became settled and business increased to vast proportions; when individuals, trusts, and combinations grew to such power that the railroads were in a measure at their mercy; when in looking for business the traffic manager was actuated by the sole desire of obtaining every cent the traffic would stand and would prefer, and therefore favor, 1 shipper who could give 100 cars of freight rather than 100 shippers who could provide only 1 car each; when carriers combined to eliminate competition and manipulate schedules in ways past all finding out; when at a time when business commissioned every car of every carrier; when railroad facilities had become so improved that a dollar's worth of labor or coal would earn more money for the railroads than ever before [applause]; when traffic sought the railroad instead of being solicited; when under such conditions hundreds of articles of commerce were subjected to an advance in freight rates; when these public servants were demanding tolls from the people to pay dividends on fictitious capital representing nothing but graft; when the railroads were assuming to say how the country was to be developed, what men should prosper, and who should fail, which cities should grow and which should not, then the people affected by such conditions—and who were not?—insisted that the servant should not be the master and that the Congress should pass a law to enforce their rights under the contract between the carriers and the public; the right to impartial treatment and to just and reasonable rates and regulations, for "it is so nominated in the bond." [Applause.]

In response to this demand the present bill has been prepared and presented to Congress. Personally I have, since my advent into the House of Representatives, been profoundly sensible of the need of railroad-regulating legislation. I have advocated it when its friends here were few. I have contended for it when it was less popular than it is to-day. I am its loyal friend now when it is a popular measure in the House, where nearly everyone is anxious to be recorded at least as its friend, and I trust that I have done my full duty in the efforts which have been put forth to bring to realization the desires of the people.

The bill attempts to place under the supervision of the Commission every form of interstate and foreign commerce, all instrumentalities of commerce and transportation. The measure which passed the House last session was believed to cover all the facilities of transportation, but inasmuch as some gentlemen contended that it did not, we have endeavored in the present bill to use such language as will take the matter out of the realm of doubt. To that end we have declared that cars, vehicles, and instrumentalities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, and all services in connection with traffic, such as elevation, ventilation, refrigeration, or icing shall be considered as being furnished by the carrier, and therefore under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have also stipulated that terminal, icing, and other similar charges shall be published as separate items, so that the shipper may understand just what he is paying for each particular service, and then we have said that all such charges shall be just and reasonable, that any other is unlawful.

Some of the most serious complaints have been those against these special services. Private car companies have been organized to do the people's work; the railroads have loaned their tracks to these companies, and while they have presented the charge to the shipper these private companies have really imposed them, and it is claimed that they were outside the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is not necessary for me to detail to the House or the country the gross injustice which has been done the people through these instrumentalities. We believe the bill effects a complete remedy for these evils. Hereafter any car hauled for an interstate carrier and any charge imposed upon a shipper, whether by a carrier or any direct or indirect agent of the carrier, must be just and reasonable, and in case it is not the Commission has power to make it so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to know, the gentleman being a member of the committee, whether he can state to us he feels assured that the terms of this bill, if carried out, will control private cars?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no doubt about that at all. I will repeat to the gentleman, I had no doubt that the last bill conveyed control of these agencies upon the Commission. The question has never been squarely before the court under the present law. I have always maintained that the power which gives the Commission control over interstate carriers gives it control over every agency of those carriers and over every car hauled by the carrier, whether owned by it or not; but this bill expressly names private cars. If the gentleman from Alabama has read the bill, he has found that the subject has been placed in this bill for the purpose of removing all doubt on the matter.

The same argument applies to elevator and terminal charges. We believe it will no longer be possible for a great manufacturing corporation to build a spur or siding up to its factory and then use it as a basis for obtaining rebates prejudicial to its competitor. The bill also aims to prevent the custom so common and so detrimental to honest competitive business followed by many large shippers, viz, of notifying the carrier that such shippers are on a certain date to have a large amount of traffic for shipment and at the same time demanding that the published rate shall be reduced on that date, so as to give them the advantage over other shippers.

This evil is known as the "midnight-rate" evil, and is one of the most effective means of violating the law against rebates known in the commercial world. We have attempted to cure this by enlarging the time in which a rate can be changed. If the bill is enacted into law, any change made in the schedule of rates hereafter must be published at least thirty days. I had hoped that it might be at least sixty days, but the majority of the committee did not agree with me on this subject, and it has been made thirty. It is thought this will give all shippers sufficient notice of a change to prepare to meet it. We were not unmindful of the fact that circumstances might arise under which it would be desirable that a rate should be lowered in less time than thirty days, so we have provided that upon proper showing of the necessities of the case the Commission may in special cases allow a change under a shorter notice than thirty days.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would not the same remedy have been obtained by simply requiring thirty days' notice as to the raising of the rate after it has been reduced? That is, you put a restriction that may handicap the railroads of the country unjustly in not enabling them to make a reduction except upon thirty days' notice.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will answer the gentleman that the bill itself, as I have already stated, provides all the remedy that is needed in such cases, because that condition could not arise except in an extraordinary case, and under such a case the bill provides that the Commission may upon proper showing in special cases reduce the rate or allow the railroad to reduce it in a shorter time than thirty days.

Mr. SHERLEY. In that case they have to first show cause, but could not the remedy you seek be obtained if they were permitted upon three days' notice to reduce a rate, but could not raise it again except on thirty days' notice?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Possibly it might. I think, however, there may be some question about that. The object of this, first, is to produce a stability of rates and to do away with that form of rebates which gives to the favored shipper an advantage which his competitors can not possibly have. As far as I am concerned, I would have been glad to have had the time extended to sixty or ninety days rather than thirty days. It would have suited me better.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman explain to the committee how it will be possible for one shipper to have an advantage over another by a sudden reduction of a rate if that rate could not again be changed in thirty days?

Mr. TOWNSEND. What advantage would there be in your plan?

Mr. SHERLEY. It preserves to the railroad the one thing that has made them more progressive than any other railroads the world over, namely, the ability to meet changing conditions in the commercial world by a change in rates, when demanded, quickly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In response to the gentleman I will say that the records will show that those stable rates, where advantages were not sought to be conferred upon some particular individual, have remained for years and years. It is only for the purpose of granting an advantage to a competitor that the carriers reduced rates in that short time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will it interfere with the gentleman if I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman has stated that the "midnight tariffs" can be prevented now by extending the time from three and ten days to thirty days' notice and publication. Now, if that thirty days' clause is violated by the common carrier, what specific penalty is provided in the act for a violation of the kind, and how is the penalty to be enforced?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The penalty provided in this bill is in case of a violation of an order. For instance, if an order of the Commission is made in the first place it is $5,000 for each violation, and each day of the continuance of that subjects the road to an extra penalty of $5,000. It is also subject to the law we have now for enforcing orders—the right to compel by mandamus or other summary writs the observance of this rate, and the road would have no right under the law to carry any freight or indulge in traffic unless it had complied with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And then, under the present law, there would only be a fine and there would be no imprisonment of any official who violated that provision of the statute?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The law makes no provision for penalties of imprisonment except in cases of making false reports or in violating the publication feature of the bill, which I will refer to later.

The main feature of the bill, the one about which the greatest controversy has been had, and the one, I believe, which lies at the foundation of the whole matter, is that which gives the Commission power, upon complaint and after full hearing, to substitute a reasonable maximum rate in place of one found to be unjust or unreasonable. To me this is a most righteous provision. Under the law, as I have stated, no interstate carrier has any right to impose anything but a just and reasonable rate, and under that same law any other is unlawful. Heretofore the Commission has had power to declare a rate unjust and unreasonable and to order its discontinuance; but it had no power, under the decision of the Supreme Court, to substitute a just rate in its place. This has resulted in making the law absolutely nugatory, so far as positive relief to the people is concerned. For myself, I have never been able to understand the wisdom of the argument which claims that a commission might be competent to determine what is unjust and unreasonable, but incompetent to advise what is just and reasonable, for I can not understand how any individual or any commission can know what is unjust until what is just is known. A thing is unreasonable because it is not reasonable. We say a thing is wrong because we know what is right, and the very proof and reasoning necessary to establish the unjust and the unreasonable has of necessity first determined what is just and reasonable.

All who have followed the arguments of the opposition during the agitation of this great question must be profoundly impressed with their inconsistency. First it was claimed, and so published to the country, that the Commission was to be empowered with authority to make all rates de novo, and that carriers were to be denied the right to fix their own rates. Full discussion and investigation have shown the fallacy of these statements; it is only the unjust and unreasonable rate that is to be affected, and full hearing must be had before that can be done.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman if he does not desire to be interrupted, but I want to ask him a question. Does not this bill give to the Commission the power that they contended they had under the maximum-rate case?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it does.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would not their action in the maximum-rate case, if it had been upheld, have changed hundreds and hundreds of rates?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Possibly. It is also known that ten or twelve railroad men can and do get together and arbitrarily, overnight, as it were, change hundreds and hundreds of rates, and the remedial power of the Commission should be as large as the evil to be remedied. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not discussing the wisdom but the accuracy of the gentleman's statement, that this bill does not give to the Commission the power to change rates.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It can not take the initiative. It still leaves to the carriers the right to take the initiative and make just rates, and this bill does not attempt to divest them of that power. Nor is such power conferred upon the Commission.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. While the gentleman is on this point in the bill, I would like to make this inquiry: Whether the gentleman's understanding of the bill as it reads confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to eliminate or correct or affect what is known as the preferential or differential rate—that is, the differential between the long haul and the relatively short haul.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am sorry to say that it does not. I stand practically alone with one or two other gentlemen of the committee on this matter. I had hoped that we might give the Commission powers to fix the differential. Others may understand that the bill confers such power, but I think no such power is conferred by the measure.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I add this? I have an apprehension that it does produce practically that result indirectly. If I understand it correctly, you have a differential or preferential consisting in a long haul as compared with a short haul, giving upon the long haul a very much less rate of freight proportionately than the short haul, and thus giving a preferential in favor of the locality situated at the end of the long haul. Am I correct in my apprehension or statement of the case?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Undoubtedly the Commission would have the right to adjust it if the long rate or the short rate is unjust.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I submit this: If it is true that the preferential or differential, as I understand it, involves this long haul and the short haul, with the purpose of giving a much lower rate upon the long haul than is given on the short haul—for instance, the fruit growers of California can get their fruit to the eastern seaboard only through a low preferential long-haul rate, which is very much less than the short-haul rate to near points in California. Now, I submit this inquiry. I want to get the gentleman's idea of what this bill will really do. I suppose that in order to correct that it could be done in two ways—by increasing the rate of the long haul, so as to level it in comparison with the short haul, or lower the short haul to the rate of the long haul, so as to bring it to a level with the long haul, imposing what the bill calls "the maximum to be charged" upon the short haul, so as to level it in that way with the long haul. Is not that possible under this bill? Now, does not this bill authorize the Commission to fix a maximum rate upon the short haul, and thus eliminate in that way the differential, and indirectly accomplish what they might otherwise be authorized to do directly?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it does. The Commission, in the first place, has no power to raise the rate, so that is eliminated.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; that feature of it——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, it has no right to reduce a rate unless that rate in itself is unjust and unreasonable.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; but that is the whole question before the Commission.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it is unjust and unreasonable it should be reduced, but it does not have anything to do with the relation of rates.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But my point is, does not this bill indirectly confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to control or eliminate the preferential or differential? Of course the assumption is that they would act properly, and would not change any condition unless there was an undue or unjust rate, but do they not get the power?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They do not unless, in the case you assume, one of the rates is too high in itself. If there is simply a difference in rates, and the higher rate is reasonable and the lower rate is unreasonable because it is too little, the Commission can give no remedy in that case.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the gentleman this question? Of course, I simply want to get this for my information and that of the committee, and I hope the gentleman appreciates that I do not wish to disturb his speech. Under section 3 of the interstate-commerce law as it now stands, as I understand it, they have authority to take charge of the question of what is called "the preferential or differential." That is to say, section 3 provides that it is unlawful for a common carrier to give any undue or unreasonable preference to any locality. That is, of course, the preferential or differential proposition. Now, as the law stands they have no power to make their orders effective, but does not your bill confer upon them the power? They have the power, under section 3, to investigate that precise situation, but they have no power to make their orders effective. I should like to ask the gentleman whether under the language in this bill, where it is provided that the Commission shall inquire whether the rates are unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, that power is given them under this bill? Section 3 is a part of the act. They have not that power now, but do you not give them that power in this bill, indirectly, through the operation of the maximum rate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think we do. I do not understand it that way at all. I understand simply that the Commission has power to fix a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate where complaint has been made in place of one that is found to be otherwise, and that it will never go to the question of the relation of the rates. The Commission ought to have the power to correct an unjust and unreasonable rate, and the committee has sought to give it that power.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; but does your bill limit it so that the Commission does not have power to take into consideration the relation of rates?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am afraid it does.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. One of the Commission advised me otherwise, in his judgment, the other day when I was talking with him.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman this question with reference to the long and short haul clause in the act of 1887? This bill does not alter the act of 1887 one particle by what it contains upon that point, does it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it does.

Mr. BARTLETT. And so far as the relation of rates is concerned, the committee declined to have anything to say upon that subject in this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman from Georgia is right on that subject, as usual.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose the Commission has set a maximum rate, say, of $1, and after that the railroad makes the rate 90 cents. What power has the Commission, and if so, where is the language in this bill that gives the Commission the right to change that 90-cent rate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They have the right to change it under section 4 of the bill, which provides as follows:

> The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, and the orders of the Commission shall take effect at the end of thirty days after notice thereof to the carriers directed to obey the same, unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The point I am making is that the 90-cent rate is not the rate fixed by the Commission, but it is the act of the railroad. That is the very thing I want my friend to discuss. I know he can do it very well.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The 90-cent rate was undoubtedly fixed by the carrier as a result of the Commission's order and any such result would be subject to change or modification as the foregoing section of the bill provides.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. That might require a new proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A new proceeding might have to be instituted, as in the first instance. It stands to reason that the Commission would not fix upon a dollar as a maximum rate if 90 cents was the reasonable maximum rate. If conditions changed, so that 90 cents was an unreasonable rate, then the Commission could modify its order or possibly new proceedings might be instituted. The bill itself limits the Commission's orders fixing rates to three years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has not the Commission lost its power to refix when it has fixed the maximum rate? The power you give is the power of a rehearing.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman's suggestion that the 90-cent rate is not a part of the Commission's order and therefore not subject to provision before quoted, then it is a new rate and subject to complaint under the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The bill says "that after a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceeding, any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same." In other words, an outside party can not get a rehearing, though oppressed; and if the party to the proceeding dies, the whole case goes out of existence. The Commission can rehear this decision, but the 90 cents is not its order, and yet this requirement is in its decision.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That, under the gentleman's theory, is a new rate, and complaint can be made under the changed conditions de novo.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; it is the rate made underneath the maximum rate which you permit for making the maximum rate, and yet that has become oppressive.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think there is no apprehension from that condition.

Mr. MANN. You give power to file a new complaint at any time?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I say to the gentleman from Tennessee. Now I believe, Mr. Chairman, in justice to others who wish to speak, that I should proceed, although I do not want to be understood as saying that I will not answer any questions; but I would like, in as orderly a manner as possible, to present my views of the bill, and then when I am through if there are any questions that gentlemen wish to ask me I should be pleased to answer them.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the gentleman from Kentucky wish to ask a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; if the gentleman will permit; one question in connection with the question asked by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]. I would like to have the gentleman explain, because the words of section 15 seem to be in conflict with the statement in the report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the gentleman mean the language as amended?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; that section as amended states that where the Commission finds the rates to be unduly preferential or prejudicial it may fix a reasonable rate. Now, I would ask whether that does not give to the Commission power over differentials. How does the gentleman explain that plain language?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the language of the original law and has not been changed.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Commission has the power on complaint to change rates that are discriminatory, will the gentleman tell the House that the Commission has not power over differentials?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The best authority I can obtain says that they have not. I will say to the gentleman that I was contending for the power over differentials, and the committee decided against it almost unanimously—only two or three of us in favor of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. And the committee considers that that language does not give this power?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It does. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to proceed, if I may, and answer some of the arguments, and perhaps in doing so I can answer some of the questions which naturally would arise on this subject.

This power to fix a contested rate is not a new principle, nor is the exercise of the power without precedent. For years many of the States in the Union have had commissions created by legislative authority of the States and invested with full power not only to adjust and establish rates about which complaint has been made, but in some instances to fix entire schedules for the carriers. The Interstate Commerce Commission during the first years of its existence assumed it had power to fix maximum rates in contested cases, and it exercised that power, and with most of its orders the carriers complied, and not until the decision of the Supreme Court in the maximum-rate case did it discontinue the exercise of that power, and during all of that time the railroads were uninjured and the business of the country undisturbed. It was also claimed by the opposition that Congress had no authority to confer upon the Commission the power to declare a reasonable rate in place of one found otherwise, for the reason that it was a delegation of legislative power, and this claim has been made notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held, where the question was squarely before it, that the legislature of a State—and therefore that the Congress of the United States—had power to appoint an administrative board and confer upon it full authority to fix rates as proposed in this bill.

The Stone case, in 116 United States, settled this question beyond a doubt. In that case it appeared that the legislature of Mississippi had created a commission to regulate and supervise railroad rates. It was taken to the supreme court of the State of Mississippi, and the constitutionality of the law was brought directly in question. The carriers contended that the law was unconstitutional for the reason that it conferred both legislative and judicial power upon the commission; that court held that such was not the case. An appeal was taken to the United States Supreme Court under the same condition, and it upheld the supreme court of Mississippi and said "that the function of the commission appointed to fix railroad rates was not legislative, but administrative." In the Reagan case, from Texas, the Supreme Court of the United States held the same thing. The reasoning in these decisions is this: The legislature having passed a law declaring that all rates must be just and reasonable, it has authority to create a board to execute that law, otherwise the legislature would be absolutely futile to regulate rates effectively in the State or among the States. This principle is recognized in the acts of municipal bodies everywhere. The commission for the District of Columbia fixes street-car fares, hack charges, gas and water rates, and nearly every city in the Union does the same thing. It should not be forgotten that the authority of the Commission is subject to review by the court as to its lawful exercise.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman stated that in the Mississippi case and in the Texas case the commissions had powers similar to the powers conferred in this bill. Now, in this bill you confer the power of establishing a maximum rate. In the Mississippi case and in the Texas case a commission was created and was given power to fix and establish the whole body of rates, to initiate them and establish all rates, and in both instances the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the constitutionality of the act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is right. The statutes in question give the same and greater powers than those carried by the pending measure.

But this is not the only constitutional objection which has been urged against the exercise of this power. It was insisted, more formerly than now, that if a commission fix upon a contested rate from any interior point to a seaport, that such action would be a violation of the so-called nonpreference clause of the Constitution, which provides that the ports of one State shall not be preferred to those of another. This provision of the Constitution was adopted at a time when interstate commerce, as we see it now, was unknown. The railroad had not then been born, and the fathers were imposing a restriction upon Congress against a preference as to exports and imports, but the same men who wrote that provision of the Constitution also inserted the one providing that Congress should regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and few constitutional lawyers ever claimed that if while exercising the constitutional power of regulating commerce as aforesaid an incidental benefit or injury should come to any port such exercise would be unconstitutional, and in all the years of our country's history during which the National Legislature has been erecting light-houses along our coasts and improving rivers and harbors whereon are situated cities, it has not been claimed that such acts were unconstitutional, although it was recognized that every city in front of which a light-house was erected, every city whose harbor was improved was to that extent benefited and, in a manner, preferred over other cities not receiving such advantages.

But, furthermore, this question was squarely raised in the Wheeling and Belmont bridge case. That was a case where the Government had allowed the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River, and it was authorized to be constructed so low that large vessels which had been engaged in commerce with Pittsburg were unable to pass under, and thus Pittsburg had no trouble in showing that she had been injured, but the court held that Congress had not violated the Constitution in exercising power of regulating commerce by the construction of the bridge, as it had exercised a conceded power, and the injury to Pittsburg was incidental and not a violation of the fundamental law of the land.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman remember the date of the building of that bridge?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not. I think that case has been up twice.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No rights were reserved by the United States in its construction that it should be removed if it should ever get in the way of commerce?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know that. It was not raised in the case. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Michigan will permit, I will say that that is correct in that case.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That there were no reservations?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. There were no reservations. I am familiar with that case.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I shall assume that these constitutional objections have been answered and that Congress has power to enact this provision of the bill. The opponents of regulation have also urged that the enactment of this provision would result in an injury to the widows and orphans of the country and to railroad employees, and when one realizes that the gentlemen who make these statements denounce as agitators and demagogues the advocates of rate legislation he understands the real nature of the opposition. But what shall we say of the argument? How are the widows and orphans to be injured? We are told that there are vast sums of money held by insurance companies belonging to the widows and orphans; that these companies invest their surplus in railroad securities, and that legislation is going to injure these securities, hence the widows and orphans must suffer, for a reduction of rates, and therefore of railroad earnings, makes a dividend on stock impossible. This should be discussed in connection with the other argument that railroad employees are to suffer for the reason that the railroad earnings are to fall off, and therefore the loss must be borne by the employees, whose wages will be reduced. Taking the two together, we have this: Railroad earnings will be reduced, the expenses of the road keeping up the stock must stand the loss, hence the widows must suffer.

Again, earnings are to be reduced, dividends must be kept up; therefore wages must be reduced. A double-barreled argument—one used to kill stockholders, another to destroy the laborer. But what are the facts in the matter? During all the period in which rate legislation has been exercised by the States, these direful predictions have not been realized. When the Interstate Commerce Commission exercised the power, securities remained undisturbed and labor was happy. The history of railroading during the last year is interesting reading in connection with this subject. When the Esch-Townsend bill passed the last Congress almost unanimously, one holding the views of these calamity prophets would naturally believe that some disturbance would occur in the railroad world, and especially when it was known that the President of the United States was back of the measure and was insisting that it should become a law and had said on several occasions that in case it failed to pass the Senate an extraordinary session of Congress would be called, and in view of the Cuban reciprocity experience, under somewhat similar circumstances, it was more than probable that the President would be successful. I know it was claimed then that the railroads knew that the Senate would defeat the measure, but I submit that the widows and orphans and other holders of securities could not have known this, and had they believed that disaster was imminent securities would have been disturbed. But events show that instead of railroad stocks declining they continued to rise in value. Furthermore, railroad managers throughout the United States proceeded to build 7,200 miles of new railroad, and up to June, 1905, they had placed orders for more than $200,000,000 worth of new railroad equipment.

No one familiar with the circumstances believes that any harm would be done the railroads, and few honest, intelligent men advocated it. The plan was, first, to prevent private rebates—that is, granting advantages to one man which another does not enjoy; second, to prevent extortionate charges. It is simply begging the question to say that the establishment of just rates will injure the railroads. One of the most serious wrongs at present is the custom which the roads have of reducing rates to certain individuals and places below what would be a fair rate, or one that would produce a dividend, and then imposing an unjust and unreasonable charge upon other individuals and places to offset the apparent loss. The country demands that all the people shall be treated alike, and that only just and reasonable rates shall be imposed. If that is done, the carrier will not necessarily be injured or its revenues reduced; the burden will be equally distributed. Frequently the establishment of a just rate, even if it is lower than the one theretofore existing, produces more revenue. This, I believe, was clearly demonstrated in what is known as the "Michigan Central charter case." In the charter obtained by that company from the State of Michigan the road was allowed to charge 3 cents per mile for passenger traffic, but the charter provided that if at any time the State legislature saw fit to reduce the rate and thus annul the charter it could do so, but that the company should have the right to go into court if it conceived itself to have been injured, and establish by a jury just what loss it had sustained and the State was to reimburse it for the same.

A few years ago the legislature exercised its power and repealed the charter, compelling the road to reduce its passenger fare to 2 cents a mile. The carrier brought suit, alleging damages to the extent of $6,000,000. An investigation of the case disclosed that immediately after the reduction of the fare the passenger receipts increased enormously, so that it is doubtful now if the roads would go back to the 3-cent fare if they had the opportunity, and this has all been done in spite of the fact that the Michigan Central road has been paralleled throughout almost its entire length through the State of Michigan by electric roads, which have done a tremendous freight and passenger business. We should also understand, that while in some cases railroad labor has had its wage increased during the last few years, the carrier's ability to earn has also been increased by the substitution of the mogul engines for the old ones, of the large cars for the smaller ones, by the reduction of grades and the straightening of tracks. Railroad operations have been materially economized.

There is absolutely no danger to labor, and I conclude, if the gentleman who used these arguments had not so repeatedly declared that they were honest, patriotic, and high-minded citizens, the charge of demagogue and agitator would react upon them.

There is still another phase of this question which should not be overlooked. Originally railroad securities were not eagerly sought as investments; to-day such investments are most attractive, and the disposition of promoters and managers has been to increase the capital out of proportion to the real assets of the companies, and now when gentlemen are asking that dividends shall be maintained they do not simply mean dividends on bona fide capital, but upon inflated capital, and I submit it is a proper question for Congress or its duly authorized Commission, when determining the question of just and reasonable rates, to inquire into the capitalization of these carriers. I know it is claimed that these stocks have been issued in many instances and placed in innocent hands and that if anything were done—and I do not consider that it will be—to injure the value of these stocks such bona fide holders would suffer. I simply answer this argument by saying that we legislate for the whole people. It is our duty to so regulate interstate and foreign commerce as to deal justly with all of our people, and if it should be demonstrated that some few holders of fictitious capital should fail to get an exorbitant return on their holdings the law should in justice be enacted, for we have no business to "rob Peter to pay Paul." [Applause.] It has further been argued that there is no proof that rates are too high, and gentlemen take pleasure in comparing the American railroad rate with that of Germany and other European countries.

Mr. TOWNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNE. I recently read a statement made by the president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, wherein he stated that the average freight-haul charge for a ton per hundred miles is 75 cents in the United States, and that the corresponding charge is $2.35 in England. Can the gentleman explain why this difference exists, if it does exist, and does he admit the inference which the statement made by the president of the road seem to carry with it. If not, why not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentleman will be patient, I will reach that matter immediately, I was about to enter upon its discussion.

Gentlemen attempt to establish the fact that rates are not too high by making a comparison between the charges of a few years ago and those of to-day, showing that what they call the "average ton-mile rate" has gradually been reduced and is lower than the average ton-mile rate in other countries. Again, I believe the argument unfair. They do not tell the whole truth and explain just what they mean by the average ton-mile rate. It is obtained in this way: All of the freight in the United States hauled during a given period, including high and low grade freight, is determined. The amount paid for hauling that freight is also found and the total number of miles it is hauled. From this, by division, is found how much it cost on the average to haul a ton of freight one mile. Freight is divided into various classes, such as first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, A, B, C, D, E, etc. In class 1, high-grade articles, paying a high rate of freight, such as silks and hats, are placed. In the sixth grade or a lower grade, for instance, is coal, which pays a low rate of freight. You can readily understand if you were to increase the amount of freight in the sixth class, while the amount in the first class remains the same, the average ton-mile rate would be reduced. It might be materially reduced while the specific rate on silk and coal had remained the same. On the other hand, if the first class was increased out of proportion to the fifth class the average ton-mile rate would be increased and still the specific rates remain the same.

Now, what has happened in this country is that the low-grade freights have increased materially, while the higher grades have not increased in the same proportion, and at the same time it is known that since 1900, under conditions of prosperity which do not warrant such action, more than 600 articles have been changed from a lower classification to a higher, thereby imposing a higher freight rate upon those articles, and yet the increase in the lower-grade freight has been so enormous that the average ton rate has not increased in proportion to the actual increase in rates. The people have obtained no benefit from this; in fact, they have been in consequence severely taxed to satisfy the greed of a public servant.

But what shall we say of the comparison between German and American rates? Germany, as you may know, is interlined with rivers and canals over which business naturally of the low grade travels, so that it never sees a railroad; therefore it does not enter into the problem of average mile-ton rate. Furthermore, in many of the European countries the delivery charge is added to the freight rate, and besides all this, it is absolutely unjust and unfair to the people to state the problem without informing them that a long haul in a European country would seldom exceed 200 miles, while the average haul in the United States would undoubtedly be a thousand miles or more.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply want to suggest to the gentleman that the short haul in Germany was due to the fact that the commission would not fix through rates, and so the roads were not able to make any through rates for shippers, and the people had to improve the waterways because of the extortionate charges of the railroads.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a condition and not a theory about which I speak.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I make an inquiry? I infer from what the gentleman states in relation to the German conditions that statistics are in existence which would on analysis show the conditions which you have just stated. I am free to say that it is a very interesting statement. I can quite understand the lowest rate of freight that goes by canal as distinguished from the higher rate by rail, and I would like to inquire if the gentleman has had any analysis of the figures showing the result? I suppose that you have.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not made any such analysis. I speak from statements made by gentlemen in whose knowledge and integrity I have confidence.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did not know but what the gentleman had it on hand and could give us the benefit of it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can see where the suggestions you make would account for the distinction of rates.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My contention is that the rate in the United States should be the lowest in the world. Our traffic is the greatest, our hauls the longest, our facilities the best. But I am convinced that if we were to compare the American rate with the European rate under similar circumstances and conditions, eliminating all elements which are not common, we would find no cause for pride in the result. Then think of the fairness of the proposition to compare our rates with those of Russia. A great per cent of its mileage is through a desert where traffic is scarcely known and business necessarily unprofitable. But, gentlemen, we are dealing with the question as presented in the American Republic, and the people have demanded that Congress shall exercise its constitutional power to regulate interstate carriers in accordance with the law, and we shall have difficulty in explaining to our constituents, who are awake to this situation, if we fail to do our full duty in the premises.

If this bill shall become a law additional duties will be imposed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is thought the part of wisdom to increase the number, salary, and term of office of its members. I believe, however, that when this law is once established the Commission will have less work to do even than it has at present, for the reason that the roads will realize the justice of the law and fix their own rates and remedy defects, but I have no hesitancy in saying that this is a great power that we are conferring upon a commission, and only men of the highest character and ability should be placed upon it. Ten thousand dollars a year salary is not inadequate for the services of such men, and by increasing the term we give the men a tenure of office which will enable them to become experts in a measure upon the questions submitted to them. Furthermore, it will fix it so no one President during a single term can change all of the members. There will always be six men on the Commission who have had experience with the problems presented.

The bill also provides for the widest publicity of railroad affairs. This, I believe, is one of the most potent influences for good. The carrier being a public servant, its methods should be subject to scrutiny; therefore we provide the method by which its accounts shall be kept. We provide for publicity of the contracts and agreements, written or otherwise. We provide that Government experts shall have the right, not simply the permission, to inspect all railroad accounts and business methods at all times, and we impose heavy penalties for violation of any provisions of the law. False reports or a refusal to make full disclosure subjects the carrier and its agents not only to a heavy fine, but imprisonment. We also provide in the bill for the speedy determination of matters submitted to the Commission. After an order has been made that order shall go into effect within thirty days from the time the same has been served upon the affected carrier. If at any time during the thirty days the carrier is dissatisfied with the order, he can institute proceedings in the district court of the United States wherein the complaint was made, and thereupon it becomes the duty of the Attorney-General to serve notice on that court that the case is of great public importance, entitling it to consideration by the expedition court. Such notice is served upon three circuit judges of that district, if there are three; if not, upon two circuit judges, and those two shall select a district judge from the district, and the three shall proceed at once to the determination of the lawfulness of the Commission's order.

This, I believe, has the following advantages over the old law: It permits three judges to pass upon a question instead of one, and their judgment will have more weight than would the opinion of a single judge and more cases will end with a decision of the expedition court. In case, however, either party objects to the decision of that court an appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, which under the law is obliged to consider it in preference to any other case pending before it, except criminal cases. The expedition court will simply pass upon the lawfulness of the order, and under the decision of the Supreme Court that means whether such order is confiscatory or whether it imposes a rate which does not yield a fair return upon the carrier's investment. In deciding interstate-commerce cases the Supreme Court has passed through several stages of opinions.

Originally it held that there was no relief from the Commission's order except by an appeal to the voters. Later it decided, and I believe wisely, that even the legislature could not impose a rate which was confiscatory, and still later, in the Nebraska case, it suggested that a rate which was not fairly remunerative to the carrier was unlawful.

It seems to me that a Commission of seven men familiar with railroad matters, knowing all of the complexities which enter into rate making, are better able to determine what is a fairly remunerative rate than any court which only occasionally passes upon the subject, and I would prefer to leave it with the Commission. But I bow always in proper submission to the decrees of the Supreme Court, and when it announces a decision I yield it obedience until at least it has had time to study public opinion sufficiently to reverse itself.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will it disturb the gentleman too much if I make an inquiry right here?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be, as a matter of law, that the Supreme Court could interfere by injunction to restrain the carrying into effect of an order of the Commission whenever they were of the opinion that the rate was unreasonably low, or is it based upon the confiscatory proposition?

Mr. TOWNSEND. My judgment until I had read the Nebraska case was that it would simply be on the confiscatory proposition.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The Nebraska case to which the gentleman refers is the case of Smythe v. Ames?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If it will not take too much of the gentleman's time, I will read the third proposition established by the court in that case, and I am free to say that I am not quite certain just exactly what the court means.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the syllabus will give us all we want on that point.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am reading from the opinion, which, of course, is a little more authoritative than the syllabus.

In view of the adjudications, these principles must be regarded as settled:

Third—

After reciting two that do not concern this discussion—

While rates for the transportation of persons and property within the limits of a State are primarily for its determination, the question whether they are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures, and therefore without due process of law, can not be so conclusively determined by the legislature of the State or by regulations adopted under its authority that the matter may not become the subject of judicial inquiry.

I will say that the gentleman from Michigan very kindly called my attention to this case yesterday, and this is the only principle that I find laid down in the case under which the court would interfere, namely, if the rates established by the Commission are so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures. I may have read the case hurriedly, and the gentleman from Michigan may have something more specific in his mind.

Mr. HINSHAW. The rate referred to there would be confiscatory.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, practically confiscatory, as I understand it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Undoubtedly the court must have had that in its mind, but it has enlarged its decisions, as I stated, from the beginning.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Since this case?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Since the first case.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This is the Nebraska case that I am reading from. So that, if I understand the gentleman correctly, the rates must be practically confiscatory before the court would be authorized to interfere.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The court undoubtedly is trying to stretch the doctrine of confiscation to cover "reasonable return." It is easy to imagine a relation between the two. The court can be trusted to include in the word "lawful" all that ought to be included. I have no doubt the Nebraska case will be used as a precedent in support of the doctrine that unless the returns are sufficiently reasonable the carrier must go out of business, therefore the rate imposed will be considered confiscatory. But if the gentleman from Maine will pardon me, I will proceed with my remarks.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not wish to occupy any more of the attention of the committee except to conclude.

For myself, I am satisfied that the proposed legislation will not harm honest carriers engaged in lawful business; all others will be and should be in imminent danger. I readily admit that there is an honest difference of opinion as to the policy of the measure. Some believe that the carriers will solve the problem if let alone, but it seems to me that such have not taken sufficient time to read and understand the history of railroading during the last few years. Gradually, but surely, rates have been raised, and during a period when there was no possible excuse for such a course except the desire to satisfy greed. Business has increased, and the net results of operation have shown that expenses have not increased in proportion to the enlargement of traffic. Railroad consolidation has been so complete that a few men, about six, control the great bulk of the railroads, and more and more the people are being placed at the mercy of these great corporations. Complaints have come up to Congress from all over the country against the growing and insolent power of great consolidations of capital, and it is not sufficient to say, as some have said, that the complainants are demagogues and agitators, for already Members have discovered among the number their most patriotic and intelligent constituents.

From the millions of farms between the oceans, whereon the bone and sinew of the Republic produce its true and substantial wealth; from the million factories which transform beneath the magic hand of enterprise and genius those farm products into myriad forms of beauty and usefulness; from the millions of tradesmen who disseminate the output of factory and loom among the people; from the professions which minister to the wants of others; from forest and mine comes up the demand that the servant shall not be above the master.

This question is not and ought not to be a political one; but as a partisan I could hail with delight the disposition of my party to take it up, for it is everlastingly right, and the people, having recognized it as such, will not be much longer put off. They demand real, positive remedial legislation, and ill will fare the legislator who offers a serpent instead of a fish.

I have not been entirely pleased with the character displayed and means employed by some of the opposition to so-called "rate legislation." To me it has seemed that a systematic effort has been made to discredit the Administration in various matters in order to distract attention from this great question, and I have no doubt that delay will be caused wherever possible in the vain hope that something will happen yet to prevent final action. As one of the younger and most humble Republicans in the House, let me admonish my party associates in both Houses that this question will not down, nor will it much longer brook delay. The people have spoken, and every day to us their command is more imperative. The day of grace may be passed, and the unpardonable sin of trifling with duty may not be condoned even by deathbed repentance.

Do some say that this legislation is born of a prejudice against corporations, and with such an ancestor must be an instrument of oppression and wrong? I think not. The great mass of the people are fair and honest and acknowledge that the railroad honestly managed under the law is a great necessary blessing. They know it was chartered to serve them, and desiring its service, they will not knowingly weaken it or lessen its ability to serve.

That the people have become suspicious of some of these great corporations there is no doubt, but there is a great excuse for it. As a rule, these organizations have resisted every effort to regulate and control them even when it was known that such regulations would be beneficial; lobbies, rich and powerful, have been maintained at the capitals of State and nation, and many seemingly unwarranted interferences with the people's rights have been experienced. They have entered the domain of politics, and in many instances seemed to have dictated the nomination and election of legislators. They have assumed that they were too strong to obey and the people too weak to enforce the law. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I owe an apology to the House for the time I have occupied in opening the discussion on the pending bill, but my excuse is that it deals with one of the greatest questions which has ever come before Congress. It is not simply a question in which carriers and shippers are interested. It reaches out and embraces every producer and every consumer in the United States. Aye, it involves the hopes and ambitions of men who, under equal and fair opportunities, will contribute to our country's material prosperity and add no little to its honor and glory, for in this day of business enterprise, into every part of which freight charges enter, success or failure depends frequently upon whether rates are impartial, fair, and reasonable, or otherwise. Such a question demands honest, intelligent, and patriotic attention. To it I have devoted much thought, yet I feel that I am all too incompetent to express the deep feeling I have of the importance of the proposition to regulate interstate carriers effectively and speedily.

Temporizing will bring nothing but disaster. Already we hear the rumbling of discontent, and socialism smiles in satisfaction with every delay. Regulation of a public servant is not a departure from the principles of popular government; but disregard of a righteous law and indifference to legal restrictions imposed to protect the people's rights are more than socialism—they are anarchy—and were I a railroad agent instead of a people's Representative I would hail the proposed legislation as a salvation to my master from the fate which an indignant people is sure to visit upon the corporations who, believing that they are above and beyond the law, seek to become a law unto themselves.

Let the bill pass, and let the railroads heed its provisions, and, instead of retarding its execution, aid in its operation, and then, instead of being the objects of suspicion and hatred, they will be recognized as the instruments of progress and prosperity. Rate legislation will enter into history, and its entry will not be marked by any business disturbance, but rather it will indicate the beginning of an era of better feeling between the railroads and the people—an era of equal rights and opportunities under a just and impartial law. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, for one I have never seen any reason to make the subject of commerce a partisan question, yet unfortunately matters affecting our commerce in various ways have divided the people of the country through our entire history. I think it exceedingly fortunate that in this case our committee has been able unanimously to agree regardless of partisan considerations. I hope it will be appreciated and approved by the House. Yet there are dissenters and cynics everywhere. The carriers denounce it as robbery and confiscation, while a New York paper editorially criticises and denounces it as though it were especially designed to protect the poor downtrodden corporations against the anarchistic demands of demagogues. Some would make mischief from malice; others would create discord as a joke. There are wags and cranks even among able statesmen and philosophers who would disregard stupendous interests and the gravity of momentous questions, sacrificing important legislation in order to emphasize a fad or crack a joke. A local Republican newspaper prophet, assuming the function without the spirit, recently predicted as to this railroad rate debate:

The speeches will be perfunctory in character, intended in the main for home consumption, except in so much as the effort of the minority is concerned to make clear that the legislation in question is really the fruit of Democratic initiative and exertion. There will probably be more discussion along that line than argument going directly to the merits of the bill.

Newspaper men are smart and witty, if not always prophetic. Sometimes they are right, always powerful, perhaps more powerful than any class, element, or agency in this country, not even excepting the twelve or fourteen billion dollars and several hundred thousand smart men engaged in resisting the enactment and enforcement of laws to protect the people against the exactions and discriminations of common carriers. Newspaper men can doom to success or failure any measure. They can doom to glory or to shame any man or woman. At the behest of their ubiquitous activity and power millionaires, Senators, Cabinet ministers rise or fall, and even mighty Presidents tremble or triumph according to the attitude of the press.

Verily its power, more than anything else on earth, suggests that divinity which "can kill or make alive." The writer just quoted, however, doubtless knew his article to be as perfunctory as the debate he anticipated, unless he meant to concede it to be clear that "this bill is the fruit of Democratic initiative and exertion," although others participated in the harvesting. He perhaps knew that since the court produced or exposed the weakness of the law to regulate commerce we have labored without ceasing to amend its defects. He also knew that in 1900, when the Republican platform was silent on the subject, the Democratic platform demanded "such enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Commission to protect individuals and communities from discrimination and the people from unjust and unfair transportation rates." In pursuance of that platform demand we have been at work ever since. He doubtless knew also that in 1904 the Democratic national platform demanded "an enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation."

Undoubtedly he also knew that in the same year the Republican party persisted in its traditional character for baseless braggadocio and hypocritical deception of the people, while truckling to their corporate campaign contributors by cajoling them with the comforting declaration that "laws enacted by Republicans which Democrats failed to enforce have been fearlessly enforced by the Republican party, and new laws enacted insuring publicity and additional remedies for discrimination in freight rates." If that meant anything, it was unquestionably intended to assure the corporations that the work of regulating them had been completed, and they need not apprehend any further legislation, and it was no doubt so understood by the corporations. Between the millions who stayed away from the polls because Cleveland's crowd procured the nomination of Parker, and the hundreds of thousands who remained at home because Bryan supported the ticket after the nomination, 4,000,000 people made the mistake of failing to vote on election day, thereby failing to ratify our platform declarations and elect our candidate.

But if the result was claimed by anybody as a victory against railroad regulation, the President-elect, undoubtedly the ablest as well as the most honest and fearless Republican President we ever had, promptly disabused their minds by taking a position perhaps as advanced in favor of our platform declaration on this subject as our own candidate could have done had he been elected, emphatically and repeatedly demanding substantially the very legislation asked for in our two platforms, and emphatically denying the hypocritical declaration that enough had been done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You spoke in the very highest terms of approval of the President, who has been favoring this legislation, and about the appalling defeat of our candidate. Now, can you quote any statement Judge Parker ever made in his life, either as a judge or a private citizen, wherein he was not in favor of railroad-rate legislation?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have read a great many things he said favoring our demand for rate legislation, but I do not remember them now. I hope the gentleman did not understand me as disparaging Judge Parker's position on the subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You did not say that he did. It was the omission to say that he did favor this legislation that prompts me to speak. He voted for Bryan in 1896 and 1900. His platforms demanded rate legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. The slip in our cog was we did not elect him, and it was fortunate for us, in this one respect, that we had a President for whom we did not vote who took the place of Parker on this one subject and did as much, I believe, as Parker or anybody else could have done in the way of declaration. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you not believe Judge Parker would have done the same thing, if he had been elected President?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no doubt on earth of it. I am very sorry he was not elected, because we would have relied on him to do a great many good things on some other questions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. ADAMSON. We would have been idiots and traitors had we declined President Roosevelt's powerful aid. Though not bound thereto by platform pledges, yet many Republican Members and Senators took position with the President, and in this connection I wish to acknowledge that in many personal respects there are some really good Republicans, despite the vicious doctrines of their abominable party. At least, many of them supported his message far enough to help us pass the Esch-Townsend bill through this House, but, unfortunately, through inexperience in the practice of political well-doing, they were unable to rise to the dignity and gravity of the occasion by helping us pass it through both Houses. Even while supporting so many meritorious provisions as that bill contained, they permitted it to be hampered with many objectionable and mischievous features. Nor is that all.

In the debate on this floor the leaders allayed all fears of the corporations, dispelling all possible apprehension by declaring that "the Republican party has determined to pass the bill through this House." We asked in vain, "Why don't you determine to pass it through both Houses so the President can sign it?" Our question met no response. Even the traditional echo, which never failed before that time, failed to answer "Why." But the result followed their announcement. The bill passed this House, but never passed anywhere else, except to death and oblivion in a pigeonhole in some other House unmentionable here, whose dignified members perhaps indorsed the Republican platform declaration that enough had been done. We did not believe enough had been done and very many honest Republicans agreed with us. Republicans and Democrats alike introduced numerous bills looking substantially to the same end, the relief of the people, who realized from daily exaction that enough had not been done.

After thorough study of all these bills which had been referred to us, all the members of our committee, twelve Republicans and six Democrats, ignoring party considerations, seeking the country's good alone, from mutual contribution and concession have unanimously agreed upon the pending bill. In its preparation the great statesman whose name it bears, and who would be a great and honest man in any party or country, rendered services which merit the undying gratitude of our people. The two gentlemen, respectively from Michigan and Wisconsin, who so ably and proudly furnished joint paternity to the bill passed by us last Congress, but cruelly deserted and destroyed somewhere else for want of attention, deserve great credit for their valuable contribution to this bill and can not be accorded too high praise for their generous, patriotic concessions and self-denial in surrendering not only some cherished ideas, but also the authorship of the bill itself in their laudable desire to secure, by unanimity in the committee, an advancement in the direction of much-needed remedial legislation. As for the Democrats, they began to feel happy at the first manifestation of a disposition on the part of the Republicans to make a forward movement.

The distinguished chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], took such advanced position and introduced such a splendid bill that it was hailed by us with delight. We could not afford to abandon our position, broad enough for joint occupancy, merely because others sought to share, defend, and improve it with us. We then offered the Davey bill, suggesting a few more good things, most of which the majority promptly accepted and gracefully appropriated. There was then nothing obnoxious in the bill. We had won that much. It also contained our main contention, provision for the correction of an unjust and unreasonable rate, whether joint or single, with ample and explicit power to enforce the order of the Commission. That met the principal demand of the country and fully complied with our platform declaration. But we had also secured the control of private car lines, with bridges, terminals, and all charges, regulations, and practices incident to interstate-commerce rates, besides improving all existing provisions for account, inventories, publicity, inspection, and all things necessary to complete fair and honest regulation.

We could not afford to hazard the advantages secured by failing to agree to a unanimous report. True, some of us desired additional provisions, but objecting to nothing in the bill we would not have been justified in filing a minority report and resisting the passage of the bill because of the omission of some other things, no matter how good, which may be made the subject of other and separate bills. We understand that a few people on both sides of the House, rehashing the same matter thrashed over by us in the committee, still object to the unanimity existing in our committee. It has been intimated in the Republican press that some Republican Members chide their brethren on our committee for bringing in a bill which the Democrats could indorse, claiming that being in the majority they ought to have carried through and labeled with a partisan stamp such action as might be had. On the other hand, it may be true that some Democratic Members would have preferred to make a fight for particular provisions, but we would have them understand that we made the same fight, and when they clearly perceived that we had to abandon the fight for them or lose many others equally valuable they will surely understand and concur in our action.

But we hear from others outside of Congress, who, through circulars and letters and the public press, condemn alike, in a perfectly nonpartisan spirit, all who would sanction any legislation to extend the arm of the law over these corporations, complimenting us with the title of demagogue, crank, etc. To all such we would answer in truth and soberness, this bill is as conservative as the circumstances will justify. It is more conservative than similar legislation to regulate other abuses and punish other crimes. They can take to themselves the comforting unction that if they are uncomfortable by the legislation aimed at them they have their own conduct to thank for it. If they had wisely pursued a moderate policy, looking to fair and honest profits upon their investments and operation, consulting the interests of the people about their schedules and practices, and treating various individuals and localities with honest fairness and moderation, Congress would never have touched the subject of interstate commerce with a view to its forcible regulation. But line upon line and precept upon precept have been ignored or "laughed to scorn." Their motto has not been "live and let live," accompanied by a practice tending alike to the prosperity of themselves and the people, but the question actuating their entire operation has been "What rate will the traffic bear?" and they have taken that rate to the last farthing.

A man who advocates a policy that charges a commodity $2 or $5 a car for crossing a bridge in one direction and nothing for crossing the same bridge in the opposite direction can not disturb me by calling vile names in a general way. A man, whether he be lawyer, president, general manager, or lobbyist, who will advocate the policy of running cars both ways through my town and charging neighboring towns much less rates of freight on similar articles in similar shape going through my town in both directions to the outlying towns, thereby enabling the other towns to come into our territory and rob us of our trade, is not in shape, morally and decently, to hurl epithets at anybody. The railroad management which touches two points in every respect equal, except that one has another railroad and does not need its help, yet charges twice as much and furnishes less facilities to the town entirely dependent upon it, thereby retarding its growth and prosperity for the benefit of the other and the carrier, is too mean to hurt me by calling me a demagogue. Yet many such instances, and worse, exist, and the answer to all importunities is that the law is not sufficient to force us to desist and you are a demagogue if you try to amend the law and make us do right.

We need railroads; they have done much to develop the country, but they could develop it more equally, fairly, and symmetrically, make more money, and be more popular with the people. I don't know a community in my section that would be willing to dispense with their railroad, even with all its exactions and discriminations. I don't know a community but wants more railroads, and those that have none want some. They all like them. A railroad train, with its power and beauty and exact and skillful operation, is not only a continuing but ever increasing source of admiration. The benefits conferred upon communities by railroads are inestimable, even after deducting the robbery; but the people know that in the corporations themselves there is nothing inimical to the public weal. Corporations for various purposes have existed from the earliest times, and the word means the cooperation of men, with the additional and all-valuable attribute of self-perpetuation through perpetual succession, the nearest imitation to immortality on earth. Through long generations corporations have handed down from age to age the blessings of one period, improved and enlarged for the benefit of mankind in after times.

There is no harm in the cross-ties nor the steel rails, nor in the engines nor cars. These are all blessings to our race. But the trouble is they are owned and operated by human beings, and they are the most intractable and ungovernable and rebellious things found on the earth. If there was any ground for the Republican contention as to good and bad trusts, it is far more true that railroads may be good or bad according as they may be manipulated by good or bad men. If the trail of the serpent has already fixed the character of the bad so that they can no longer pray, "Lead us not into temptation," the good ones may well remember their principles and guard their conduct "when kind occasion favors warm desire." I say without fear of contradiction that but for the unparalleled greed and unsconscionable rapacity of certain railroad managements to exercise their power to the utmost limit in oppressing the people, regardless of their appeals, their distress, their interests, instead of discharging their duties as common carriers with an honest view to the mutual benefit to themselves and the country, they would have been the most popular people and instrumentalities upon the face of the earth, and not one breath of demand for legislation would have reached our ears.

As early as the Fifty-fifth Congress I made a speech in this House demanding fair, reasonable, and just freight rates, and warning the roads that persistence in their conduct would arouse to wrath an outraged people. They ignored that as all other warnings, persisting in their plans to do as they pleased, charge what they please, retain all necessary lawyers to conduct all cases, visit vengeance by proscription and discrimination on all who oppose them, resist by all sorts of means proposed legislation, and denounce honest legislators who are driven by persistent outrages, yielding to no other treatment, to enact remedial and punitive legislation as the only means of checking the evil.

It should be admitted that railroad property is as sacredly entitled to the protection of the law as any other property. The law should no more confiscate railroad property than it should allow railroads to confiscate other people's property. The owners of railroad property have the same right as other citizens to participate in that government which controls and regulates their property in common with all other, and should not be abused nor proscribed for exercising such rights as all other citizens to express their views, advocate or oppose legislation, and prosecute and defend in the courts.

At the same time they are not justified in objecting to similar participation by their fellow-citizens interested in their operation. The carriers are authorized by Government to occupy and operate the highways and channels of trade and travel in a manner exclusive, practically, of all others, very much as officers are elected and charged exclusively with certain duties, while vested with other rights. The carriers are clothed with functions of public duty and prerogatives which require them to consider and conserve the interests of the people at large, as well as their own. By their very nature, their inherent character, as well as by written constitution and laws of government, they are subject to control and regulation. They should serve all men and localities with fairness and impartiality; they should make schedules and connections to promote the convenience and interests of the people, thereby securing their own interests; they should make charges fair and without discrimination; they should be reasonable and just, which relates more to equality of condition and service than to the rates charged.

A dealer would rather pay a hundred and fifty dollars for a car while his competitor pays the same than to be charged only a hundred dollars while his competitor is charged only seventy-five. It is a tried and true maxim only when properly applied, that "competition is the life of trade;" but competition may be entirely destroyed through unjust conditions, bankrupting men and localities by discrimination. Men should not, nor should communities, be deprived of the benefit of competition by law, which is done when a railroad, chartered by Government, clothed with quasi-official powers, under the regulation of Government, is permitted to loot one shipper or locality in the interest of another. Carriers should not be denied the right to compete when they will, but when they combine and refuse to compete the law ought to give the shippers the same rights which refusal to compete denies to them. The only question material is the question of method of regulation, and that has been settled by the Government. Were it an open question I should favor the plan of clearly defining the rights of the people and the rights and duties of the carriers, not only providing ample and prompt remedies, but also making a category of crimes with speedy trial and sure punishment.

Thus railroad officials would be placed on the same basis with other citizens and officials. A crime by a railroad man would be punished just like a crime against property committed by another man. Criminal mismanagement of a railroad and robbery of the people by unconscionable exactions would be punished just as similar misconduct on the part of public officers. If a railroad man charged more for hauling the same commodity a short distance over the same line than for a long distance, he ought to be punished as a criminal; if it charges one shipper or locality more for the same service, punish him as for any other crime. If discrimination as to schedule or service was perpetrated, apply the criminal law. But this Government has been long committed to another fixed plan, cumulative in great part it is true, but yet well established and very popular. It has been so long practiced and so often construed that it is easier to follow its general lines and make such amendments and improvements as the circumstances demand.

The Railroad Commission has accomplished great good by its labors. It would have accomplished much more had its power to enforce its orders been greater. The people from ocean to ocean, from Canada to Mexico, have long and loudly demanded the increase of the Commission's power as the one avenue to higher efficiency. We have heeded their cry and sought to do what they asked by improving and perfecting as much as possible the laws already on the books, in which there is already great value and which can be rendered far more valuable by the amendments suggested. The power to make rates was so stoutly denied and resisted with such spirit that pending the struggle we sought some advantage by passing an act to expedite hearings, because the cases were congested in the courts, but it did not go far enough, for it did not apply to cases brought by the carrier, far the more numerous class, but was limited to those brought by the Government, and as to the latter and smaller class we left the discretion in the Attorney-General to certify to the necessity of expedition. In this bill we seek to remedy that defect by extending that act to cases brought by carriers and making it the duty of the Attorney-General to furnish the certificate.

Another very important remedy some of us sought to make, but failed. We have long desired to amend the long and short haul section by striking out the qualifying clause "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," the construction of which has destroyed the value of the section. The complications of water transportation furnished a plea to resist our efforts. The conditions of water transportation exist in various and all parts of the country.

The ocean rolls almost around us; the rivers ramify our magnificent territory; the bays, inlets, and gulfs make long and wide indentations in our shores. Almost everywhere trains are running in every direction loaded with commodities going every way, coming in contact with cheap navigation, multiplying the perplexing questions as to how the rate situation should be determined and settled. Water competition presents an ever-present difficulty. It is all around us and among us; and those who possess these advantages will not consent voluntarily to surrender them.

We wished to make the amendment, however, in order to transfer from the courts to the Commission the power to determine what exceptions should be allowed and when. But though driven to yield we could do so with more grace because we have secured substantially the same remedy in the power of the Commission to correct a specific rate and enforce the correction, which power applies to any point though it may be affected by the long and short haul clause, and the power is really transferred from the courts to the Commission, as we desired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman concludes, it will be of great assistance to the committee, and I know it will be to me, if he will put his finger on and read or put into the RECORD that part of this bill which gives the Commission the right to unfix and refix a rate made by the railroad which is less than the maximum rate which the Commission itself made. In other words, the Commission fixes the rate at $1, the railroad makes a 90-cent rate. That rate may become obnoxious in law and fact. Now, will the gentleman put his finger on a single line in this bill, or in the law which is amended by this bill, or the law as it will be when this bill passes that gives that Commission the right to unfix that 90-cent rate?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman means to fix one the second time?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, sir; fix the same rate the second time. I say that it is not in this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will go into that section now.

We had differences about the provisions, the language, and stipulations of that provision; but, Mr. Chairman, the contention between us having been with the other end of the table, led by the distinguished chairman, insisting that they had provided for a maximum rate, the language used being the "reasonable, just, and fairly remunerative maximum rate." We said that would be construed differently from the professed intention; we said that would be construed by the courts to mean the Commission only being referred to and direction being given to its action it would be construed to mean that they are upon investigation to fix the highest rate which would be reasonable and just, and under the rules of grammar it could not be understood any other way. But with a patriotic disposition to conservative action the chairman, supported by his colleagues at that end of the table, yielded and changed the language so that unmistakably it now defines the right of the carrier and limits his highest charge to the rate fixed. No man can find any substantial difference between that and ours. Ours simply said they shall declare what shall be a reasonable and just rate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Would not that be the actual rate that the roads were charging?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I was proceeding to say.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The maximum rate would be the utmost limit.

Mr. ADAMSON. I say there is no difference. The carriers are going to take the rate that the Commission fixes, whether they say it is highest rate they can charge or the rate they shall charge. It is with the Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, suppose the Commission is in error, the maximum rate having itself proven to be unjust and unreasonable. Suppose that. Now, where is your power for the Commission to make a new rate? That is one proposition. Just one more. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I love to be interrupted. I like to have anybody help me make a speech.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not need any help. Now, as I was about to ask you: First, you file a complaint, take proof, have a hearing, and have a judgment fixing the maximum rate. Now, this lasts for three years.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not what it says. It does not say it shall last, but if it is still alive at the end of three years, it shall then die.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, then, that was a dollar rate, and the railroads have fixed a 90-cent rate, but that, too, has proven to be oppressive. Now, I have earnestly read your bill. Is there any language in the bill, if it becomes law, that will give the Commission the right to go along and unfix that 90-cent rate and fix a rate reasonable and just?

Mr. ADAMSON. The very fact is that we are moving all the time. The fact is that everything gets either better or worse, and that we do not stand still. If it be true, as contended by some people, that the trend of rates is to go lower, before the expiration of three years the likelihood is that the rate desired by the railroad itself will be far below the maximum fixed. I hardly believe, under the conditions in this country, that any rate at all—or, rather, it would be an exceptional thing for any rate to live for three years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope that will be the case. Suppose this 90-cent rate has now proven unreasonable, and I know of cases in Iowa and, I think, in Illinois, where the railroad fixed a rate at less than the maximum rate, and that new rate proved to be unreasonable. I ask, Is there no way in this bill for the Commission to take charge of that and refix it—this 90-cent rate? I refer to the language on page 18 of the bill, section 16 (a):

> That after a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceeding any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same.

Now, "any party thereto" can get a rehearing,—not an oppressed outsider. An outside party can't get a rehearing. This refers to the decision or order or requirement of the Commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. It would be an extraordinary occurrence if a party outside of the record could make an application for rehearing of a case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A may be dead, and B wants to make a complaint. The party to the suit may die, but B may live. He is still oppressed and wants to have the rate changed. Now, then, this language here does not refer to the rate made before. It says "after a decision." That is a decision by the Commission. "Order." That is an order of the Commission. After any "requirement." That is a requirement of the Commission, that the party to the record may ask for a rehearing. But a rate of 90 cents made by the railroad is not a decision of the Commission. It is not an order of the Commission; it is not a requirement of the Commission; but it is the act of the railroad. Now, I want to get at your authority to correct that act of the railroad.

Mr. ADAMSON. Do you hold that the amendment of the fifteenth section does not allow the Commission to hear a de novo case by another shipper, to correct a rate it has itself made?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am asking you now for information.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think you are making a mistake.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked my friend from Iowa yesterday where was the refixing power of this bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think the refixing power is contained in the provision for the original fixing power.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not find it in the language.

Mr. ADAMSON. I say in that language, amending the fifteenth section, you will find that whenever after any investigation, or any hearing in any case filed by anybody, on either side of the question, the Commission can hear a new case—not the same case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose it is a case about the same rate—suppose it is the rate for hauling apples from Georgia?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A files a suit against the railroad, and the rate is fixed at a dollar by the Commission. Now, A dies. In the meantime the railroad itself has fixed the rate at 90 cents. Now, B says that the 90-cent rate fixed by the railroad is oppressive, and he wants it changed. The Commission has already fixed a maximum rate for the hauling of apples from Georgia. Now, what I want to know is, Where is your power to refix a rate for hauling apples from Georgia, which rate the carriers made?

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no rule of law in the world that would bind B in a contention to which he was never a party. But you put the case itself in a much stronger attitude than that, as I understood your question at first, both to myself and to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. You supposed that some time would elapse, and conditions would be changed, and the 90-cent rate itself would grow too high.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no doubt on the face of the earth that under the initiative language of that amendment——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, read that. That is what I want to get.

Mr. ADAMSON. That the Commission would have the authority to fix a new rate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The whole jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission depends upon a complaint being made.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I refer to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is true, and everybody knows that, but I am trying to get at the thing that everybody does not know, and that is the authority for this power to refix a rate made by the carrier which is less than the maximum rate fixed by the Commission.

Mr. HINSHAW. The contention of the gentleman from Tennessee is that the judgment of the Commission in one case, if you may so call it, will be a bar——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. HINSHAW. A bar to any further proceedings on identically the same subject-matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. HINSHAW. As I understand the gentleman from Georgia, he thinks that if another party becomes the party complainant in a new proceeding that the judgment in the other case is not a bar to further action.

Mr. ADAMSON. Nobody ever claims it. Any man can go into court (in this instance before the Commission) at any time he chooses and take his chances of winning or losing. It may be that the case would be more easily determined after there had been action in a similar case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the Commission have already spent their power in fixing the old rate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, no. Here is the language——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what I want to find.

Mr. ADAMSON. At the beginning of section 15, under amendment 4:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is that?

Mr. ADAMSON. On page 10 of the bill which the gentleman handed to me—and it shall be its duty whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the words "whenever" and "any" are not broad enough to admit of as many investigations as the multiplicity of parties and the changing conditions may make desirable, I do not understand the definitions of the words.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. ELLIS. As I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], in raising his question he goes back not only to section 15 of the bill, but to section 13 of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS. And I want to call attention to this section 13, because I am inclined to the view that there is something in the contention.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is no question that there is something in it, and you ought to make it clearer, even if I am wrong.

Mr. ELLIS. This is in section 13:

That any person, firm, corporation, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in contravention of the provisions thereof, may apply to said Commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the charges thus made shall be forwarded by the Commission to such common carrier, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the Commission.

Now, in the case supposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] there would have been nothing done in contravention of this act. They could not acquire jurisdiction, in other words, under the express language of section 13. The hearing would have been had, the Commission would have made its finding——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly; and it would have fixed the limit.

Mr. ELLIS. It would have fixed the maximum rate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. ELLIS. And then the railroad would have reduced the rate 10 cents, and there would have been no infraction—none whatever. Now, where do you get the jurisdiction?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have spent your power in fixing your dollar rate—the maximum rate, the only kind of a rate the Commission can make in any case under this bill.

Mr. MANN. May I offer a suggestion?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The law is that the rate must be just and reasonable. After the maximum rate is found by the Commission it stands until circumstances intervene which make that rate unjust or unreasonable. There is no question that the Commission has power to entertain jurisdiction over a new complaint.

Mr. ADAMSON. I fail to notice any language which the gentleman read in section 13 that contravenes that.

Mr. MANN. That is expressly what the language of section 13 says.

Mr. ELLIS. Would it be contended that under that general provision the Commission could fix a minimum rate?

Mr. MANN. The Commission can not fix a minimum rate; the Commission could select the lower rate upon a new complaint.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. They could make that a new maximum rate.

Mr. MANN. Yes; they could make that a new maximum rate. The Commission can entertain a new complaint every time the circumstances change.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish my friend, who is so accommodating and learned, would put his finger on that and read it to us. I have asked the question time and time again for information.

Mr. MANN. I would read it, but the distinguished gentleman from Missouri has just read it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is when you first file a complaint. I am talking about after you have fixed the maximum rate. Here is my point: After the complaint has been filed and the maximum rate has been fixed—say at a dollar—the railroad then fixes the rate at 90 cents and that rate proves to be unreasonable and oppressive for any reason. Now, I am trying to get at the power given under this bill, when it becomes a law, to unfix that 90 cents, if it is unreasonable and unjust, and fix a reasonable and just rate. The Commission has spent its power on that rate and fixed it at a dollar, the maximum rate, and it is not allowed to fix a rate that is not a maximum rate. Where is your power to unfix and fix this 90-cent rate?

Mr. MANN. The trouble with the gentleman from Tennessee is that the gentleman is not perfectly familiar with section 13. The law is that the rate shall be just and reasonable. The gentleman assumes that the rate becomes unjust the moment anybody thinks the maximum rate or the rates put in force by the railroad are unjust and unreasonable. That person can file a new complaint under section 13 alleging that it is unjust and unreasonable.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to debate with the gentleman from Illinois as to the trouble with the gentleman from Tennessee, but I will tell you where I think his mistake is: It is in assuming, unwarranted by the language of section 4 in amending section 15, that the Commission can never hear but one complaint about one case, whereas the language is specific to the contrary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Read it.

Mr. ADAMSON. On page 10 it says:

That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, turn to page 18 and read subsection 16 and you will see that the rehearing is on the "decision, order, or requirement" of the Commission. Now, the 90-cent rate is not the "decision, order, or requirement" of the Commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not talking of the new trial between the same parties or the same case. If you lose on a case in that particular instance, that section authorizes you to move for a new trial or ask for a new hearing.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I can not recall the language, but it occurs to me that somewhere in that bill there is a provision that the Commission may at any time revise a rate they have formerly made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the 90-cent rate is not a rate they made. It is one that the railroad has made, and less than the dollar rate fixed by the Commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is this trouble with the gentleman from Tennessee: We do not limit the power of the Commission to correcting the rate the railroads make. We will never interfere with a rate the railroad has made as long as it is reasonable and just. The railroad in the outset has the initiative to make its rates, and if it will do right and make them right, we will treat the railroads like anybody else, because the laws are made to protect the good from those who are bad, and if the railroad makes an unjust and unreasonable rate we will correct it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How can it be an unreasonable and unjust rate if it is underneath the maximum?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have not fixed a rate at all. I am speaking of the original rate. But the Commission can, on complaint and hearing, correct any rate found at the time to be unjust and unreasonable. The gentleman says he understands the bill to mean that the power stops with canceling a rate once, and the right of the citizens to redress ends, but I say in that that he is mistaken. Afterwards, if conditions change or if other shippers know new facts, or if other shippers suffer in a different way or are more familiar with the situation—if at any time under changed conditions the same party, or under the same conditions and after a time other parties who have not been heard want to file a complaint with that Commission, the Commission will hear it.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me, I will call his attention to page 14, line 18:

The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course.

Mr. HEPBURN. Again, on page 18, line 24:

That after a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceeding any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is exactly what I have read here, Mr. Chairman, and it refers to the "orders, decisions, and requirements" of the Commission, which is the dollar rate that I am talking about, but the 90-cent rate is not the "order," it is not the "decision," it is not the "requirement" of the Commission, but it is the act of the railroad company, and I can not find any power in this bill that gives the Commission the right to go and unfix that 90-cent rate and fix it justly and rightly. Now, I would like to get the section giving this refixing power of such a rate. I confess I am ignorant of it, and that is what I want to be enlightened upon.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the dollar rate is just and reasonable, why get it changed?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Because the rate, in fact, is unreasonable and oppressive.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to suggest to my colleague, if the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon a complaint had, should fix a reasonable rate and should declare that to be a maximum above which the railroads should not charge, and if the railroad did not then charge the rate being fixed by the Commission, but should charge 90 cents, and it should turn out that that was an unreasonable rate, under the authority given in the sections to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has called attention, the Interstate Commerce Commission could then, on its own motion or upon complaint of any party to it, fix that rate again and make it 80 cents.

Mr. ADAMSON. Unquestionably. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is the lettering of the bill that gives that power?

Mr. BARTLETT. The part just read by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But I take issue with the gentleman on that.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was the intention of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not doubt that, but put it in plain English.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in response to his remarks, to this suggestion. It appears to me that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has allowed his pure and clear mind to be troubled by a fallacious idea. Now, nobody supposes that the same case will come up by different parties day after day before the same Commission, because this is a country in which we hear from one another occasionally, and it would be foolish to expect that; it would stop of its own folly. Therefore the only possible chance to exploit the idea or condition that he suggests would be some time afterwards, when conditions are changed and the rate had been tested, that somebody else would try to make a case in the event, as he suggests, that the original complainants were dead.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] seems to have the idea that the language we use in section 4 amending section 15 confines the original jurisdiction of the Commission to rates which it had never before touched, but I do not see how it is susceptible of any such construction.

Mr. ELLIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire information. I am after light, because light destroys this microbe that creates these fallacious ideas.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am sure I am very grateful for any interruption the gentleman may wish to make.

Mr. ELLIS. I am affected by that same microbe that is affecting the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not like to be poisoned by the railroad microbe. That is what I am after in this bill.

Mr. ELLIS. The answer, I submit, of the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], does not answer the question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can I not get the gentleman to flatter me by saying that I did answer the question? I thought I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIS. No; I do not think the gentleman quite understood the proposition. Let us look at this language suggested by the chairman. We are talking about the method by which the Commission gets into the proposition originally or subsequently.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; our difference is that you are afraid they never could come in on another case after having once fixed a rate.

Mr. ELLIS. Let us see about that. We are talking about a new case, because, as I understand it, the condition predicated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] would make a new situation—entirely new.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, and a lot of lawsuits would occur.

Mr. ELLIS. Now, the language read on page 14 pertains to a new situation. "The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner." We are not talking about a situation like that. Your initiation of the consideration of a given case is under section 13 and under a clause that is not amended at all. If it was a new proposition you would have to get your jurisdiction through that part of section 13. Now, under the state of things suggested here, and not at all impossible, but very possible because of one that has already frequently happened, you will have made your order. Now, I ask you to modify the order. Without violation of the order, as will be agreed, the railroad has simply stepped below the maximum fixed under the order of the court and fixed a rate that is entirely proper, because it is below the maximum; but circumstances do change and that lower rate is found to be oppressive to some community or some individual or some association or corporation—some of these natural persons or artificial persons described in section 13. Now, how is the Commission to step into the breach in a condition like that?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think in that case it would step in.

Mr. ELLIS. That is exactly the effect produced upon our mind, that the Commission not only would not step in but would have no authority, so far as we are able to find, to step in.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think I would have no difficulty if a client came to me as a lawyer; I think, if I told you the investigation had not been too recent, if there was any reason to believe our new case would be treated with any hope of success, if the other investigation had not been so recent and full as to preclude the hope of our winning, I would suggest that we file an application or petition with this Commission, as provided in section 4 amending section 15. I would have no idea that petition would be dismissed because that Commission had once tried another case.

Mr. ELLIS. Who would file it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would file it in the name of my client, if I had a client.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You would want to change, in that case, your dollar rate, would you not?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would want to proceed just as though the Commission had never heard of any such rate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Say it is apples from Georgia, as I said a while ago.

Mr. ADAMSON. That would be developed, and I would have sense enough to tell my client, as a precaution, that he would have to make a strong case or abide by their ruling.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I said in a supposed case a while ago, which my friend has elaborated, that you want to ship your apples, say, from Atlanta to Nashville.

A MEMBER. Louder, please.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My supposed case was something like this: A wants to ship apples from Atlanta, Ga., to Nashville, Tenn., and the Commission, on complaint, duly fixes a rate of $1. Subsequently the railroad charges 90 cents for hauling those apples from Atlanta to Nashville.

Mr. HEPBURN. In the first place the Commission does not fix the rate at a dollar. It fixes the maximum rate of not more than a dollar.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, that is a dollar—that is the same thing.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, it is not the same thing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is my case: The Commission says the railroad shall not charge more than a dollar, so a dollar is the maximum. It is the same thing in effect. Now, the railroad charges 90 cents, and circumstances change and that rate becomes intolerable and oppressive, as it has in the great State of Iowa, and brought about a number of lawsuits on cases where they were charging a rate less than the maximum fixed by that great Commission. Now, where is the authority for the Commission to unfix that 90-cent rate and fix a new one? Now, the gentleman from Iowa alludes to this language:

> That after a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceedings any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same.

It says any party to the old lawsuit, but here is a new man, who is not party to the lawsuit; so he can not have any rehearing because he was not a party to the lawsuit. Again, that paragraph alludes to a "decision, order, or requirement" made by the Commission. The 90-cent rate is not a decision, it is not an order, it is not a requirement of the Commission, but is the act of the carrier.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Pardon me a minute more. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], whom I esteem as much as anybody in this House or out of it, and I acknowledge his great influence and ability to make laws, refers to page 14 for authority, in the following language:

> The Commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper.

Suspend or modify "its" orders? The 90-cent rate is not its "order." Now, where is your authority for it to unfix and fix this 90-cent rate?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What would the gentleman have them do?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The gentleman's theory is that they can not do anything.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would have the language as literal as it is in Iowa, Illinois, South Dakota, and Nebraska statutes, that the Commission "shall have from time to time the right to change its schedules," or words to that effect, and that is what all of these great laws have had written in them literally, and yet this great committee has seen in its wisdom that no such language should be in this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the 90-cent order is not the result of the Commission's action, why does the gentleman contend that the Commission could not take action?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Because you have already fixed the maximum rate on apples between Atlanta and Nashville at $1, and the railroads charge 90 cents, which is legal because not above $1.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman says that the 90-cent rate is not the result of the Commission's action?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not all.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the railroads should fix a dollar as a maximum, and they make it 80 cents; has it that power?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where has it the power to do that?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just read the language.

Mr. ADAMSON. If "whenever" and "any" are not words of significance as wide as the universe, there are none in the dictionary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will find, I think, I am right in this construction. In every one of these commissions, in Iowa, Illinois—the latter the oldest one in the country, and about the best one, unless it is Iowa—Nebraska, South Dakota, and in every one that I have read, it says specifically, in a great big, pregnant section, "that the commission shall have power from time to time to change its own rates." Where is that power here? If it is here, let us put it in plain English, so plain that a blind man can not fail to read and understand it. Let us, I say, put it in in haec verba, that the Commission shall have the right from time to time to change its own schedules. Let us say in plain language what we mean.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am exceedingly obliged to my distinguished friend for his assistance. I think he is utterly mistaken in trying to construe language that needs no construction, but that, with all the fullness and specific significance that the English language is susceptible or capable of, provides exactly for any and every correction of an unjust and unreasonable rate that may ever be imposed anywhere in the United States in interstate commerce.

The words "fairly remunerative" we yielded to, because it did not change the sense a particle. I do not believe that in any country where the laborer is worthy of his hire, where it is acknowledged that railroads are desired by everybody and in every community, and where the right to earn a fair return is acknowledged by everybody, that a commission in considering what is reasonable and just would fail to consider whether it was fairly remunerative upon actual, honest, unwatered investment.

There are provisions in this bill to investigate all of those things. There are provisions which call for the most thorough and the widest publicity; there are provisions to secure correct and uniform accounting and reports. There are methods provided for ascertaining all information that is material for the fixing of the relations between the corporations and the people.

Mr. BOUTELL. Right at that point, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. BOUTELL. I have read recently in several of the leading southern papers very earnest editorials, written prior to the introduction of this bill, protesting against this policy of fixing railroad rates by a Commission, and expressing, what seemed to them, well-grounded fears that this Commission in fixing rates, for example, from the Mississippi Valley and the West to tide water, would inevitably discriminate against the southern Gulf ports and in favor of the Atlantic ports.

Now, if those fears were well grounded, certainly they are worthy of most earnest and serious consideration; and if it would be in the line of the gentleman's argument, I should like to have him refer to that matter as to whether those fears were well grounded; secondly, if well grounded, whether this measure as recast throws such protection around these ports as to give them the natural advantages of geographical situation; and, third, whether it is the design of the movers of this measure to do away with the natural advantages of geographical situation in acquiring the business of the country.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman for his interruption. I thank all my fellow-statesmen for helping me with this speech; and the gentleman, no less than any other I know of, can render me assistance.

In pursuance of some remarks made a few minutes since, I repeat that the railroads have a right to advocate or resist, in the press or before legislatures and Congress, any movement which they deem injurious to their interests. The allied railroads of this country have not been derelict in their duty to take care of themselves, for there is one law they always regard, even if they disregard all others, and that is the law of self-preservation, in pursuance of which it is said they have a bureau of information and publicity; and I admit that they have a right to have inserted, even as advertisements in newspapers, if they wish, any legitimate, decent argument which would militate against regulation, which they have resisted so steadily and stubbornly as to weary the people very much with their obstinacy.

Mr. BOUTELL. Right in that connection I would say that these editorials that I have particularly in mind were apparently inspired absolutely by local interests.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not doubt that.

Mr. BOUTELL. And civic pride.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not doubt that.

Mr. BOUTELL. I remember about three or four weeks ago the New Orleans papers, which I reckon among the most ably edited papers in the country, expressed the serious fear that the natural advantages of the port of New Orleans would be discriminated against in this legislation; and I trust the gentleman will appreciate that these articles that I referred to seemed to be those that were animated by the civic pride of these Gulf ports and absolutely disconnected with any corporate or railroad influence.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no doubt in the world that the press as well as a great many of the people at New Orleans, Savannah, Mobile, Brunswick, Galveston, Charleston, and ports on the south Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf do in good faith cherish very grave doubts and fears as to the dangers that they may suffer at the hands of the Commission, if it should be a partisan or sectional Commission. Now, I have been doing my best to divest myself of the idea of sectionalism. Bearing in mind the language of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE] the other day, quoting the Kentucky girl, that Yankee would be only half a word, that it ought to be "Damnedyankee," I do not want that in my head at all. I have never said a sectional or partisan word as such since I have been in this House, and so help me God, as a patriotic American citizen, I never will. [Applause.]

But before our committee, in its hearings last year, there was some testimony going to show that it was desirable that power should be given the Commission to raise the rates from the Northwest to the southeastern ports, and it was specifically said that the routes running from the Northwest directly to the eastern seaports could not compete with them, and in that connection something was quoted to the effect that a barrel of flour could start at St. Paul and roll to New Orleans without any propulsion except the power of gravitation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. J. J. Hill said that.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course, if we did not believe that the embers of sectionalism are practically dead and buried forever, in the minds of honest men, or at least sufficiently so that we might hope for honest administration to the extent of securing honest commissioners, we would all fight your proposition to the death. But if, as intimated by two or three witnesses up there, the purpose was to force the raising of the rates which were satisfactory and profitable to the carriers, because God and nature had made the conditions favorable for a larger and cheaper haul, of course we would never consent to it.

In the debate on this floor during the last Congress I rose in my place and referred to it while the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] occupied the floor, and he assured me that in this enlightened day and generation there could be no fears of such an outrage being perpetrated on our commerce.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, on that line I want to state——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, speaking about the New Orleans paper, there were two cases decided by the Cooley Commission, on which there was a member from Alabama—Judge Bragg, I think. The New Orleans Cotton Exchange filed a complaint and brought in ten or fifteen of the large railroads going from one side of the country to the other—and Vice-President FAIRBANKS was one of the lawyers in the case—insisting that cotton rates to New Orleans were excessive and that there were eastern discriminations. The cases were heard, first one and then later the other, and the rates on unpressed cotton were reduced from $2 to $1.50, and on pressed so much, and the railroads obeyed the order; and they went still further and reduced some of their rates about which there was no complaint. Now, it did not ruin New Orleans or Memphis or Tennessee, and cotton still grew in Dixie and the railroads still survived and the people, too.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee. I remember that when one of these witnesses was on the stand in the hearings before us he complained of this situation: That the roads with which the roads to the Southeast from the Northwest competed—five or six of them—during one season of the year, when the river and the lake route was open, allowed it to make the rate a great deal lower than the southeastern roads had, and all these roads conformed to it during a few months it existed. But at another period of the year, when the lake and river route was frozen up, these roads had nothing to conform to and then they made another rate of their own, and all agreed to it, and went back to a higher rate, and that was above the one to the Southeast. I said, If that is the way you do your own folks up there, you are not entitled to protection from any law.

Now, of course, the Constitution forbids that any port should be discriminated against, but local conditions in almost every region are intolerable, the railroads have so outrageously disregarded the rights of the people in so many communities that the people have determined that their only hope of relief is to place their reliance upon extinguishment of sectional hatred and partisanship and hope for that protection under the tribunal and the flag of the Union that they have been unable to secure anywhere else.

The railroads have brought it on themselves. If they had treated the people right nobody would have wanted to legislate against them. If they had treated the rights and interests of the people in all communities as fairly as the lawyers, and doctors, and preachers, and merchants, and farmers, and artisans naturally treat them, and are required by public opinion to treat them, Congress would never have touched the subject.

But when a carrier hauls across a bridge in one direction at a high price for crossing the bridge, and charges nothing for bringing the same commodity across the bridge in the other direction, they can not blame the citizens of a town who are discriminated against for going to Congress for relief. When a carrier hauling two ways on a given line passes through a string of four or five good towns, and, no matter which way it goes, have a town on each end of the string of seven to which they haul through the other five towns and deliver at less rate—40 to 50 per cent cheaper than they would to stop at either of these towns—they have nobody to blame for this action but themselves. I do not care how much such criminals call me a demagogue. They can not hurt me. I am sorry that the legislation has to be enacted, but that is the object of all legislation—to protect those who have rights and try to do right.

The bill secures the interests of the people as to through rates and joint rates, and in all respects provides not only necessary publicity, but all needed facilities for enforcing just treatment, with punishment and swift reparation for injustice. We did not attempt to make a perfect and universal system, but only to improve an established system by needed amendments, and having secured and agreed upon so many desirable things, including the material things desired and demanded, we ought to strive to make this bill the unanimous action of the House, without material change or amendment. The amendment as to the number and salaries of the Commissioners was like some other things—a compromise between the present provision and much larger number and salaries.

We think there is work enough for seven of the best men the country affords. If we secure men of that grade and they do the work, they will earn their salaries, and be cheap at the price. There was so much objection to conferring the power to change classification that we were compelled to yield, but with the consolation that the provision secured, conferring power to correct a specific rate, would afford substantial relief, we "mourn not as those who have no hope" at having to give it up. We likewise failed in our effort to pass the provision subjecting all carriers to common-law liability on bills of lading which the initial carrier was forced to furnish, but we abandoned that with the comforting consolation that through routes with just rates are amply provided for whether through volition or compulsion.

We have secured such a good bill that we are unwilling to hazard it in any manner. We members of the committee shall vote, and urge all our associates who sincerely desire rate legislation to vote with us, against all amendments that may be offered, regardless of character or merit. Different conduct on our part would be bad faith and our supporting them might provoke retaliation from the other side of the House, which might result in expunging from this bill every valued provision it contains. So we think good faith and good sense alike dictate that we unite in opposing all amendments. For the reason that we unanimously agreed upon this bill containing all that we could agree upon, each side securing much of value by reason of conceding other things desired by the other side, and all fearing the loss of much or all by efforts to modify our work, agreed that the bill as completed should be adhered to by all the members of the committee, and that all amendments offered should be resisted.

For that reason the majority refrained from its customary practice of bringing in a rule always obnoxious to popular notions, and I am sure that faithful conduct upon the part of members of the committee, aided by the respect and consideration of their associates in the House who favor rate legislation, will carry the bill intact and unimpaired to its final passage in this House. Let us then hope that whatever steps are necessary in any other house or place unmentionable here to carry it to the President for his signature will be promptly and honestly taken.

Let not our Republican friends justify the prediction so freely made that this semblance of interest in rate legislation on their part is a pretense and a sham designed to sidetrack and prevent tariff revision, and that, although a good bill may pass this House, in some other place either a pigeonhole will entomb its despised and lifeless remains or some milk and cider substitute will mock the hopes of the people and allow genuine regulation to fail after it is too late for this session to deal with that other infinitely meaner and greater robber, the notorious public enemy—protection. I can not allow myself to believe the prediction.

I believe that good men and true can be found in the official membership of the Republican party to cooperate with us in carrying this measure up to the President for his approval, thereby demonstrating to all men that there is some good in the Republican party, and that this bill is not partisan, but intensely patriotic, conferring upon our matchless commerce relief and benefit, which will enable it to put forth its giant strength, scatter its manifold blessings and benefits to the enrichment and happiness of the greatest, the freest, and the best people the world ever knew, enjoying prosperity under equal and honest conditions.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware that it will be impossible to add anything to the voluminous, comprehensive, and very intelligent statement made on this bill by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who has studied the question for years and has given almost his undivided attention to its details. I could not hope to elucidate the subject more fully than he has done. However, I think it is incumbent upon me briefly to set forth what I regard as the salient features of this legislation, because, perhaps, in a peculiar way, it affects the great trans-Missouri country in which for eighteen years I have had the pleasure to live.

This bill is voluminous and complete, and is an honest effort to reach and correct the various abuses and discriminations which exist in railroad traffic. It provides:

1. That all charges for transportation of passengers or property shall be just and reasonable, and all unjust and unreasonable charges are prohibited under strong penalties.

2. Every common carrier shall print and keep open to public inspection schedules, plainly printed and posted, showing rates, fares, and charges; all classifications of freights; all terminal charges, and charges for icing refrigerator cars.

3. No change in rates shall be made except after thirty days' notice, plainly stating the changes proposed and the time when they shall go into effect. This provision seeks to avoid the so-called "midnight tariffs."

4. It shall be unlawful to charge or collect a greater or a less compensation for any service than is named in the schedules so printed and posted.

5. Every carrier must file with the Interstate Commerce Commission copies of its schedules, and notify the Commission of any proposed changes at once, and all joint tariffs between connecting lines shall likewise be filed. These schedules may be made public by the Commission. A carrier refusing to file the schedules may be compelled by mandamus and punished for contempt and enjoined from transporting property at all until compliance.

6 (and most important and far-reaching of all). The Commission must, when shown that a rate or charge, regulation or practice is unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, preferential, or prejudical, prescribe a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative maximum rate, and make an order that the carrier shall cease to publish or collect any rate in excess of the maximum so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect in thirty days after notice to the carrier, and remain in force until set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

7. If the owner of the freight renders any service or furnishes any instrumentality used in transportation, the charge therefor shall be just and reasonable, and the Commission may, on a hearing had, fix and enforce for such service a reasonable rate. This provision controls the charges for terminal facilities, icing of cars, and private cars furnished by the shipper.

8. Any carrier or its officer neglecting or refusing to obey an order made by the Commission shall forfeit for each day's refusal $5,000, and this bill provides appropriate and effective procedure for its collection, and also to compel the carrier by injunction or mandatory process to obey.

9. Annual reports from all interstate carriers are required, showing in detail:

(1) The amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payments for the same;

(2) The dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders;

(3) The funded and floating debts, and the interest paid thereon;

(4) The cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments;

(5) The number of employees and the salaries paid each class;

(6) The accidents to passengers, employees, and other persons, and the causes thereof;

(7) The amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements;

(8) The earnings of and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources;

(9) The operating and other expenses;

(10) The balances of profit and loss; and

(11) A complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet.

Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations, concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts, affecting the same as the Commission may require; and the Commission may require a uniform system of accounts and prescribe the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

The bill also provides severe penalties for failure to make such reports and for false swearing and false entries, and the Commission shall at all times have access to all records of every kind belonging to the carrier and may employ special agents to examine them.

10. The Interstate Commerce Commission is increased in number from five to seven members, not more than four to be taken from any one political party, thus insuring speedy disposition of complaint and prompt remedy of wrongs.

The provisions of this bill have been considered most carefully by the committee for two sessions of Congress. The House at the last session passed almost unanimously a bill in substance the same as this one, but not so extensive in its details. This bill has the indorsement of every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, both Republican and Democratic, and comes to us by a unanimous report of that committee. It is no secret that it has the distinct approval of the President of the United States. It follows exactly the recommendations of the President in his last annual message.

The opponents of railroad-rate legislation contend that freight rates are lower in the United States than in most foreign countries, in some of which the Government owns the railroads. Undoubtedly this is true of certain classes of through rates, but an examination of rates on noncompetitive articles shows that most foreign rates are lower than ours. There was a time in this country when there was railroad competition. By the consolidation of railroads into systems and the practical control of the various systems by men who are more or less interested in all, competition has been largely eliminated and we are confronted with the necessity of governmental control. Railroad statistics do show that rates fell from 1867 to 1900, but that since 1900 there has been a general increase of rates throughout the country. In 1867 the general average was 2 cents per ton per mile. In 1900 it was about three-fourths cent per ton per mile. This decline in rates is generally attributed to the spreading of railroads and the competition that ensued. Freight rates advanced after 1900. Railroad authorities claim that the advance was but 5 per cent. This is fallacious, because while the rate itself has not very materially advanced there have been changes in the classification of freight which have had the effect to increase materially freight rates. Especially is this true on all domestic products, constituting one-fourth or one-fifth of the entire tonnage. It may be said, with reasonable accuracy therefore, that the increase on domestic products has been as high as 20 per cent. Many classes of goods have been lifted from the third to the second class and of course thereafter pay a higher freight rate. Besides, the minimum carload has been raised from 24,000 to 30,000 pounds, which means that the man who ships a carload containing less than 30,000 pounds must pay the full rate of 30,000 pounds. An instance of substantial increase occurred within a few years on lumber shipments from the southeastern States to Ohio River points, where the rates were increased 30 to 40 per cent, notwithstanding the fact that the shipments increased from five to ten million tons, and the net earnings of the railroads would have increased enormously without the change of rates. Undoubtedly this one act alone affected substantially the price of lumber throughout the West and North. Since this increase of rates was made by a concerted action of the Southeastern Freight Association, whereby competition was eliminated, it is apparent that there is no remedy at hand except Federal supervision and control, under a statute which will invest some tribunal with effective powers and adequate machinery of enforcement of its decrees.

In making comparison with foreign countries it must be remembered that their genuine capitalization per mile is much greater than ours, due to the greater cost of roadbed and perfection of safety appliances and, while wages are lower, the aggregate of wages is much greater, about $6,000 per mile to our $2,600. Again, the mail is carried without charge on Government-owned railroads and freight is delivered to the consignee by railroad drayage without additional charge. These items, if added to our freight rates, would make them much higher. In foreign countries the average haul of freight is about 25 miles. Here 240 miles. The charge for 25 miles there is 2 cents; here 5 cents. In Nebraska local freight rates are probably four times as high as rates on similar local business in England. More than half of American shipments are of raw material, the cheapest to handle, while in England about three-fourths of all are of the finished product.

Our people do not complain so much, however, of high rates as they do of discriminations between persons and places. Thus an English shipper has been given a rate of 24 cents per hundred pounds on tin plate from Liverpool by steamer and rail through Philadelphia to Chicago, and the Philadelphia shipper was charged 26 cents from Philadelphia to Chicago alone, and the railroad part of the Liverpool man's rate was only 16 cents. Quite often this discrimination more than overbalances the tariff duties. We may not be able to control freight rates on the ocean, but we can on the land, and thus prevent these discriminations that tend to drive out of business American producers and shippers and hand over the business to the foreigner.

These are but a few instances that might be enumerated indefinitely about these unjust discriminations in order that a railroad may get business, which it may do at a much lower rate for one person than another. The result of it all has been that as between this country and foreign countries quite often the tariff rate upon cement, upon tin plate, and upon various other articles of commerce has been absolutely nullified by the discrimination in this country between ports and interior cities of the land. Perhaps one of the most important features of this bill is its publicity feature. It has well been said that publicity as to all corporations and their doings and their acts would probably lead to remedies without the intervention of law. And so, if this bill is carried into successful effect by the publication or the possible publication of the books of the railroad companies and resort is had to their archives and to their records, which may be published in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it seems to me the question of the solution of all these difficulties has really been reached without the necessary intervention of criminal or even civil law. This bill has a multitude of provisions for publicity. Severe penalties are provided for failure to afford full publicity.

Another condition that has confronted our country has been the midnight tariff. I have in my possession a letter from a shipper in my district in which he sets forth that the real trouble with the small shipper in this land is the discrimination that results from the secret giving of information of a coming change in or a lowering of a rate, by which a favored shipper in some locality—and there always is some favored shipper there—has knowledge for days and perhaps weeks beforehand that the rate will be lowered at a certain date. He goes to work and gets the freight of that community—the grain or whatever it may be that is to be shipped—into his hands, knowing that the rate will be decreased. He can overbid his competitor, who knows nothing of the coming change.

This bill seeks to avoid it by saying that the railroads must give thirty days' public printed and posted notice of the coming change. It might have been better to have made it sixty days, but in any event it is believed that this feature of notice will avoid the evils of the so-called "midnight tariff."

Another great difficulty which was sought to be remedied by the Elkins antirate-rebate bill, and which has been evaded in many instances by charges for terminal facilities, charges for small switches, or for 4 or 5 miles of track owned by the shipper, and by the payment to him of a relatively exorbitant higher rate for a terminal facility or other instrumentality, he gets, in effect, a rebate upon his entire shipment. This bill, in my judgment, meets that difficulty, and says that these terminal facilities, these switches, as well as private cars and icing of private cars and refrigerator cars, shall be just and reasonable, and the Commission is invested with power to see that a reasonable and just charge only is made for these different facilities, taking, no doubt, into consideration the general freight rates along the whole line over which the shipment is to be made. This bill doubtless will not meet all the expectations of all the people of this country, but it is a grand step in a proper direction.

Railroad commissions have been established in many of the States of this Union, and almost without exception they have proved salutary and beneficial in meeting the object for which they were instituted. In my own State of Nebraska that is one of the agitated questions, and we will probably in the coming session of the legislature establish a railroad commission, and it is thought by virtue thereof many beneficial results will come in the adjustment of local freight rates. But this bill seeks to control those rates that affect this whole country in interstate commerce that can not be reached by any local railroad commission. There is another subject upon which much has been said, upon which many protests have been received by Members of Congress, and that is that this bill will so reduce the dividends and gross earnings of railroad companies that it will be necessary to take out of the employee of the railroad companies part of his wage in order to recoup the railroad company for the loss. Possibly some railroad employees have been led to believe that such a condition may exist. Their fears, in my judgment, are utterly groundless. I have in my district many railroad employees, in the welfare of whom I am deeply interested. They are my personal friends. I would not see them injured in any way if I could possibly help it. But I do not believe that the American people have any reason to fear that the administration of an impartial, nonpartisan tribunal of seven distinguished and able men, whom the President of the United States will have the power to select, will under any conceivable circumstances so affect the revenues of the railroad companies that the employees of the roads will suffer.

Mr. Chairman, our country is unusually and remarkably prosperous. My own State of Nebraska, by reason of fine crops and excellent prices, is sharing in this remarkable prosperity. Nevertheless, there are many evils which demand correction by proper legislation. Our age is progressive. Comforts and conveniences which were sufficient in times past no longer satisfy this progressive age. Our people know that their condition has grown better and better, but they are not blind to the fact that along with our wonderful prosperity have grown up evils, financial and political, which require immediate and effective correction. Among these is the great and growing problem of transportation. The problem of transporting persons and property is the greatest that this country will ever be called upon to solve. Upon its ultimate equitable solution depends the weal or woe of millions of persons and countless places. By unjust discriminations railroads may exalt or cast down cities and States; may enrich or impoverish communities and individuals. It is not proposed by this measure to turn the tide of affluence into waste places, nor to impoverish the garden spots of our land, but to give to each individual a square deal and an honest opportunity to obtain the advantages which nature has legitimately and abundantly bestowed, taking away the unnatural impediments which greed and avarice have placed in the way of the humble citizen who has neither pull nor preference, and to put him on an equality in the markets of the world with his wealthier and more influential competitor.

If a note of warning were necessary, I would say that this movement is only a part of our industrial evolution, and it can be neither stayed nor hindered.

Those who seek to obstruct will find their last state worse than their first, for these movements, like running water when dammed up, but gain increased momentum from obstruction. When wisely directed, industrial movements like this add to prosperity and bring about a more equitable distribution of the products of toil and the activities of invested wealth. I, for one, am optimistic, and confidently believe that our lawmakers and our President will continue to meet and solve the vast industrial problems which confront us, and the future unveils before the eyes of my countrymen a prospect richer and grander than has ever been portrayed before the eyes of men. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], in charge of the time on this side, for him I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] such time as he desires.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that it ought to be a matter of some gratification to the Members on either side of this Chamber, if not to the people of the country, that this bill comes before us for consideration with the unanimous approval of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives. I do ont undertake, Mr. Chairman, to say that there were not sharp and well-defined lines of difference betewen members of the committee, but I do say that with an honest and, what appeared to me to be, a patriotic desire to lift this great economic question of business, and business purely, out of the realm and the influence of politics and its environments, realizing all the time, as I believe each one of the members did, how vastly important it was that our legislation upon this subject should be equally fair and just to the interests and the welfare of all the people as well as the interest and the welfare of the railroads—the greatest instrumentalities of commerce and business that we have—we made such concessions as enabled us to agree.

Actuated by these reasons, Mr. Chairman, we were able to stand altogether in favor of this measure. I do not pretend to say for myself, and I do not believe that any other member of the committee entertains the idea, that this is a perfect bill. Why, no. No human law is perfect. There are a good many features and provisions in this bill that I would like very much to have stricken out, and there are some important features and provisions left out that I would have liked very much to have put into the bill. And I suppose that such is the condition of every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is not an easy task, Mr. Chairman, to get eighteen men, many of whom are fixed and determined in their political differences, many of whom have been on this committee for years and years, and have differed in the past earnestly and sincerely about this great railroad problem—I say it is a difficult matter to get them to stand together for the same measure; and I sincerely hope that the same spirit which controlled the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee will influence and guide this House when its Members come to make criticism upon our work. We have done the very best that we could under all the conditions and circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I call attention at the outset to the fact that the provision is stricken out of this bill which occupied nearly three-fourths of the Esch-Townsend bill, and against which we Democrats stood earnestly and unconditionally and unqualifiedly, our expression being found in the terms and provisions of the Davey bill of the last Congress. I go a step further and say that a minority report would have been absolutely inevitable if that same provision had been in this bill. I refer, sir, to the "court of transportation." As a lawyer, wedded to my profession, believing in equal rights and equal privileges under the Constitution to all citizens and all people in this great country, I never did believe and never could have been brought to believe that it was right or a safe precedent to establish a separate court simply and alone to pass upon the interests of railroads and nothing else.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is no longer in the bill. Anyone who wishes to do so can look at the Davey bill and look at the contention made by Democrats on that subject in the last Congress. I said just now that I hoped the minority in this House, whom I have in part the honor to represent upon the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, will accept this bill just as it is intended, as the best that we can do under the surroundings, conditions, and circumstances. We ought to remember that great reforms never take place all at one time. Great evils that have gathered like carbuncles upon the body politic for years and years can not be eradicated with one stroke of the pen. It takes time and deliberation. The bill, I think, is plain and simple in its terms and provisions and will substantially give the relief we seek. It is not a sham or makeshift of a bill. It proposes real and practical remedies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it matters but little what changes have taken place with different members of the committee in respect to their views. Concessions have been manly and honorable and frank upon both sides. Many of us have changed and modified our views, and the man who since the adjournment of the last Congress has not in some manner modified or even changed his views has certainly not given close attention and study to this great subject. I say that with the utmost respect. Many of us have at least modified our views. We have yielded on important points that we contended for in the last session of Congress. This can be easily understood and readily explained. Since the adjournment of the Fifty-eighth Congress many of the greatest intellects of this country—lawyers, preachers, men of letters, all classes and vocations of people—have expressed their views upon this question. Some said it was "commercial lynch law;" others said it was "revolution" and disaster to the business of the country for Congress to give authority to the Commission to regulate the rates of carriers. It was under these circumstances and conditions that our Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee met on the 4th day of December, at the beginning of this Congress, and having read many of these pamphlets, books, and other expressions, together with five large volumes of Senate hearings and hearings before our own committee for five years past, we resolved that we had heard enough on the question and that there would be no more hearings, but that it was time for action.

Mr. Chairman, I think it proper for me at this time, before entering upon the discussion of the merits of the bill, to refer to the cardinal, fundamental lines of demarcation between the rights and interests of the public on one side and the rights and interests of the common carrier on the other. Every man who stops and thinks for a moment knows that these common carriers are but the creatures of public will. They are created, in their original intentions and objects, for the purpose of advancing, promoting, subserving, and carrying forward the interests of the people, the development of the country, subject always to a fairly remunerative, reasonable consideration for the service rendered. They are but the creatures of the will of the public, clothed with the extraordinary power of eminent domain in order to more efficiently serve the interests and convenience of the people. No one contends that when the public granted these charters there was not reserved the right in those charters, implied or expressed, to the States that granted them, to regulate, supervise, and control these great corporations. But some people in this latter day and time, who argue this question, seem to ignore absolutely those cardinal differences between the rights and privileges of the public and the rights of these corporations.

They seem to think that these corporations were created alone for the benefit of the companies themselves. It is, Mr. Chairman, a strange argument to hear that the powers granted by the people to common carriers can, without responsibility, be used to the injury of the people. Why, in the early history of railroads in this country the people relied upon competition. They were less rigid then in requiring rate legislation in order to encourage railroad development. They had a right to rely upon competition at that time. There was no such thing as these great consolidated, continuous through lines then. They were all separate and distinct, and competition was inspired, instigated, and encouraged by honest struggle and rivalry in traffic. But what is the condition to-day? Why, there are great combinations and consolidations of capital, amounting to billions and billions of money, invested in these great railroads, having more than 210,000 miles of trackage, controlled by a few men.

Such consolidations of many short routes into a continuous interstate line in no manner alters or interferes with the power of Congress to see to it that these common carriers in their interstate traffic shall not be permitted to violate the spirit or the letter of the charters by the States that gave them life. By consent, expressed or implied, these consolidations of different lines of railroads have been permitted by the States that granted the charters, and the submission to and exercise of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution can not possibly be interpreted as an interference with the rights of the States that originally granted the charters. I dare say, Mr. Chairman, that American statesmanship will never be unequal to the task of enacting such just and proper legislation as will control and regulate any and every combination of common carriers that demands of shippers an unjust and unfair price for a service rendered. [Applause.]

Competition has disappeared to a very great extent and is no longer considered a factor in this matter. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to follow the history of this legisaltion in the matter of amendments and court decisions from the time the act to regulate commerce was passed on the 4th of February, 1887, to date, for they are known to all. I have believed that the Commission was right in its action and conduct for the first decade after it was created—that is, it inquired and investigated about the rate of the railroads that were complained of and it reduced an unreasonable rate and made it fair and just when they saw proper. I believe that Congress intended to give that power and authority to the Commission, but it appears from the Maximum Rate case that it failed. The Supreme Court of the United States held that the terms of the act to regulate commerce were not sufficiently plain and clear to sustain the Commission in the exercise of such authority; that while it was intimated and suggested in that line, that in order to give the Commission such a power as that the language, according to all the constructions of courts, as to the grant of powers must be plain and emphatic, so there could be no mistake about it. It was not that way.

So, since 1897, when that decision of the Maximum Rate case was made, what has been the result? The railroads have been substantially dominating the situation. Nobody denies that. No one says practically to-day that there is any law in this country to revise or supervise or regulate a rate fixed by the railroad, by which relief can be given a shipper against an unjust rate. The authority of the Commission is advisory under the present law, and that is all that it amounts to. It is useless at this time to consume time in pointing out the defects in the present law, and how and why the Commission, in its most important object, has been comparatively a failure. It needs the power to enforce its own orders.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the railroads themselves to a very great extent are responsible for the earnest demand that is being made throughout the country upon this Congress—which this Congress is going to respond to—that some relief be granted from the unjust conditions that we are subjected to to-day. Suppose the carriers had gone along, even under the semblance of the law as it existed after the Maximum Rate decision, and been obedient to the law, had corrected its rates in accordance with the suggestions of the Commission, had comprehended the situation and dealt justly and fairly with the people, There would have been no such agitation as we have had for a few years past; no such question as we are discussing here to-day would have been with us. They have done to the contrary. I am not abusing them.

No argument of abuse ever reaches a fair-minded, well-balanced man. But we are stating facts. The people generally are kindly disposed to our railroads. They appreciate how valuable they are to us; how they promote our comfort and convenience, and how necessary they are in the development and growth of our country. No thoughtful man, fair-minded citizen desires unnecessarily or injuriously to hamper these great avenues of trade and commerce. The public and the carriers should be mutually dependent on each other and their relations just and honorable. Even the strongest and best advocates of the railroads can not deny it. What have they done? They have, in the exercise of their unrestrained power, resorted to all manner of rebates and discriminations and manifold other devices touching their tariff rates with shippers until they have engendered distrust and dissatisfaction among the people, which accounts for the mutterings that come to us from one end of our country to the other. I would not be understood as saying that all common carriers have done this, for that would not be true. There are cases where men living together in the same town, engaged in the same business and competing with each other in their sales, the one securing secret rebates and the other paying the full published rate. What does it mean when a man's neighbor and his competitor at his next door is unable to sell a commodity as cheaply as he does? It means bankruptcy to that man. There is no escape from it. It is inevitable and will come sooner or later.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely believe that we have reached the time when the country demands of this Congress that there should be some legislation that will actually relieve the people of the imposition of unfair and discriminating rates that carriers place upon the shippers. I believe that this bill comes as near doing that as any bill that could possibly pass this House and be accepted by the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Wherein does this bill change the penalties that are imposed for violations of the interstate-commerce law?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Where any order of the Commission is disobeyed or violated, the bill provides a penalty of $5,000. Other smaller penalties are provided for, as I now recall it, relative to accounts, schedules, etc.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is not that the same penalty which is provided in the existing act?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; the same. Does not the gentleman think that is enough?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the penalty of imprisonment ought to be added.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think that $5,000 fine for violating an order of the Commission—and that is the penalty each day that the carrier continues to violate the order—is just as far as I believe conservative people are willing to go in this matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did not the original law provide the imprisonment penalty?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The Elkins law struck that out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But the original act of 1887 provided the imprisonment penalty, and it was not stricken out until the Elkins Act of 1903.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; the Elkins law repealed that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; and weakened the original law, and when this bill fails to restore the imprisonment penalty it ratifies the weakening of the original act by the Elkins law.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. All I can say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is that I am not advocating excessive fines or penalties.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman has had something to say about rebates and I quite agree with him in what he has said about that. But will the gentleman from Alabama point out in the bill any new language supplementing the interstate-commerce law of 1887 as amended and the language used in the Elkins bill on the subject of rebates? In other words, is there anything in this bill on the subject of rebates supplemental to those acts?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Specially there is not, because the Elkins bill—as all railroad men admit—did in all the hearings we had—had accomplished something in the stopping of rebates. I believe that rebates to certain classes of shippers are still being granted by some carriers. The rate-making power will cure evil of rebates.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the gentleman from Alabama believe that the provision against midnight tariff, the provision against private cars, against terminal tracks, is a provision to stop the most iniquitous forms of rebate that are known?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think we have several provisions in this bill that will prove most efficient in suppressing rebates. I am coming to that in my remarks.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, the suggestions of both gentlemen are valuable, but while I think that would have some effect, yet there is no specific language enlarging the law on the subject of rebates, as I understand it. Now, you say that it has been stated by those who seemed to know, or ought to know, that rebates have ceased to a large extent under the Elkins law. Does the gentleman not know it to be a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission in its last report has most emphatically said that the Elkins law has had very little effect in stopping rebates?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I do not know that, because I have just read last night——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, it is a fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I have recently read from the testimony of Judge Prouty, given in the hearings before the committee of the Senate, that he thought the question of rebates had been practically settled, and that it never was as important as some other questions.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me make myself a little plainer. In the report of 1904 the Interstate Commerce Commission did say something commendatory of the Elkins Act, and that it had had some effect on rebates, but in their report of 1905 they took back what they said in 1904, and say it has had very little effect on the stopping of rebates.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I hope the gentleman does not understand me to say that I indorse the removal or the repeal of the imprisonment feature in the Elkins Act.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not understand the gentleman as saying so, and I do hope that that can be retained.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But this is a concession bill. I think the officers of corporations ought to be put in jail when they do wrong. You can not put the corporation in jail, you can not imprison that, and when the imprisonment feature of the original commerce act was stricken out by the Elkins Act you settle the question of putting the officers in jail or punishing them by imprisonment.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Is it not true that the Elkins bill has very greatly remedied the evil of rebates? Is it not also true that the railroads evaded the provision of the Elkins law by such devices as special cars and one thing and another, which we have provided for in this bill, so does not that suggestion meet the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that nothing has been done in this bill toward the settlement of the evils which the Interstate Commerce Commission complains in its last report?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] I will state that I did not like the repeal of the imprisonment feature of the Elkins Act. I admit that the Elkins law has had a good effect in stopping rebates with small shippers, but the big ones are still there and engaged in the practice of rebating. That is the view I have of it. But the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] is correct in his statement that the carriers by various devices evaded the provisions of the Elkins law against rebates.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk the following, which I ask to have read at this time as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

The abuses of which we have a genuine right to complain take many shapes. Rebates are not now often given openly. But they can be given just as effectively in covert form; and private cars, terminal tracks, and the like must be brought under the control of the Commission or administrative body, which is to exercise supervision by the Government. But in my judgment the most important thing to do is to give to this administrative body power to make its findings effective, and this can be done only by giving it power, when complaint is made of a given rate as being unjust or unreasonable, if it finds the complaint proper, then itself to fix a maximum rate which it regards as just and reasonable, this rate to go into effect practically at once—that is, within a reasonable time—and to stay in effect unless reversed by the courts. I earnestly hope that we shall see a law giving this power passed by Congress. Moreover, I hope that by law power will be conferred upon representatives of the Government capable of performing the duty of public accountants carefully to examine into the books of railroads, when so ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission which should itself have power to prescribe what books, and what books only, should be kept by railroads. If there is in the minds of the Commission any suspicion that a certain railroad is in any shape or way giving rebates or behaving improperly, I wish the Commission to have power as a matter of right, not as a matter of favor, to make a full and exhaustive investigation of the receipts and expenditures of the railroad, so that any violation or evasion of the law may be detected.

This is not a revolutionary proposal on my part, for I only wish the same power given in reference to railroads that is now exercised as a matter of course by the national-bank examiners as regards national banks. My object in giving these additional powers to the administrative body representing the Government—the Interstate Commerce Commission, or whatever it may be—is primarily to secure a real and not a sham control to the Government representatives. The American people abhor a sham, and with this abhorence I cordially sympathize. Nothing is more injurious from every standpoint than a law which is merely sound and fury, merely pretense, and not capable of working out tangible results. I hope to see all the power that I think it ought to have granted to the Government; but I would far rather see only some of it granted, but really granted, than see a pretense of granting all, in some shape that really amounts to nothing.

It must be understood, as a matter of course, that if this power is granted it is to be exercised with wisdom and caution and self-restraint. The Interstate Commerce Commission or other Government official who failed to protect a railroad that was in the right against any clamor, no matter how violent, on the part of the public, would be guilty of as gross a wrong as if he corruptly rendered an improper service to the railroad at the expense of the public. When I say a square deal I mean a square deal; exactly as much a square deal for the rich man as for the poor man; but no more. Let each stand on his merits, receive what is due him, and be judged according to his deserts. To more he is not entitled, and less he shall not have.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I very cordially insert that extract in my remarks. It powerfully and clearly presents this question of relief for the people in strong, terse, and unmistakable language. It suggests another feature looking to the benefit and help of the people against corporations that I have never seen in any bill in Congress. Of course, every one on the floor of the House understands that those are the sentiments of President Roosevelt, uttered in the remarkable speech that he made on his southern tour at Raleigh, N. C. Some people have charged that the President is drastic and radical in his views on this question. Not a sentiment expressed in the article just read can be complained of by any carrier that wants to do right and be honest. I say there is a suggestion in there that appears in this bill, that never has appeared in any other bill in this House, which ought to and will commend itself to every thoughtful gentleman on either side of this Chamber. The Interstate Commerce Commission had complained lustily that they never could understand nor unravel the books of the common carriers, that they kept their books in such a manner and in such a style that they could not tell anything about the shipment of freight nor anything else. This provision suggested by the President of the United States, and appearing in this bill, requires that the Commission shall prescribe the manner and mode of bookkeeping, and goes one step further. It says that the Commission must have the right and authority, and it is granted in this Hepburn bill, to appoint expert accountants to go and examine those books and make report back to the Commission.

And the President even goes one step further than that in his speech at Raleigh, all of which, Mr. Chairman, is a moderate and reasonable suggestion—logical and fair to all concerned. He says where the Commission has a suspicion even—that means a reasonable suspicion founded upon a judgment of a man who has looked well into the facts and surroundings—if it has a suspicion that rebates are being granted, that they have the right to appoint accountants to go and examine and see whether those rebates are being granted. That means business. That means something is to be done. Now, Mr. Chairman, in that connection, while I believe that the policy and principles of this bill of conferring a power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a rate in lieu and instead of an unreasonable rate, did originate and was advocated by the Democratic party in three consecutive national platforms, but I say, Mr. Chairman, that the great credit of this whole discussion and this whole agitation belongs to the courage of the President of the United States. I have no hesitancy in giving him the credit for it to that extent. He has brought it up, he has named it, he has pressed it, he has urged it, in my opinion, in opposition to many of the great leaders of his own party. Without the President's active aid the question of conferring this rate-making power on the Commission would have been a dead issue. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk will read another extract from a speech which I made in the last Congress on the 6th and 7th of February, 1905, daily RECORD, when I was in part representing on the committee the Democratic views on this question. I ask the Clerk to read in the lines marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is our duty, and it behooves us as patriotic, well-intentioned citizens and Representatives of our people, to go slowly in this matter, and not to engage in hasty or hostile legislation. Nobody wants that. It behooves Congress to be deliberate and proceed cautiously and conservatively. We can not accomplish every needed reform at once. No thoughtful man can doubt that it is an enormous power to place the rate-making power in the hands of a commission when we now have over 200,000 miles of railroad trackage. But yet legislation is needed. This is admitted. Let it be simple and plain. Give the Commission the rate-making power and await results. This would be following the plain and unobstructed and open way to the harbor of relief. No man can deny that. It would be giving us the advantage of all the experience that we have had for the last twenty years in the litigation that has taken place, in the construction of the act to regulate commerce, in the rules that have been made for governing and understanding this great question of rates as to justice and fairness. That would be the effect.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am simply laying my premises for the principal point of this discussion, which I am about entering upon. I now read section 4 of the bill which we are considering:

SEC. 15. That the Commission is authorized and empowered, and it shall be its duty, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or upon complaint of any common carrier, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates, or charges whatsoever, demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers, subject to the provisions of this act, for the transportation of persons or property as defined in the first section of this act, or that any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates, are unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise—

I call the attention, Mr. Chairman, of the committee to the use of the word "otherwise"— in violation of any of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; and what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed; and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the Commission find the same to exist, and shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for such transportation in excess of the maximum rate or charge so prescribed, and shall conform to the regulation or practice so prescribed. Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier, unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, that provision, as we all understand, does not strike from the section of the old act (section 13) the authority that has been given the Commission under the law as it now stands, but instead of making it advisory it now gives them the power, after they have investigated a challenged rate, to inquire into it, and, if found to be unjust, declare what a reasonable rate is as a substitute and in lieu of the rate that was fixed by the railroads which was unjust. No man contends that the Commission ought to be clothed with a power to regulate rates generally. Studious efforts have been made throughout the country to make it appear that the Commission was to be clothed with authority to regulate rates generally and at will. For myself, I never would vote that such authority be placed in the hands of any five men or seven men, no matter how intelligent, how great, and how just and fair they are. This bill intends—and only that—to give power to the Commission to investigate the rate that is complained of, that is challenged—to investigate that rate. Bearing in mind that only the single specific rate complained of can be investigated, how is it practicable, midst thousands of other rates untouched, for one challenged rate to bring confiscation. What becomes of all of these arguments that these great railroad advocates made before our committee that confiscation is likely to result?

Mr. LAMAR. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. LAMAR. Does the Alabama State commission confer upon your State railroad commission the original power of rate making without reference to making a rate only upon complaint made?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not believe the Alabama law confers upon the commission power to make a rate at all, and in that I think it makes a mistake. I do not think it confers it at all. Many of the States of the Union grant the rate-making power to their commissions, but Alabama does not. That is why I like this bill. It is plain and speaks in such plain and unambiguous words that construction becomes unnecessary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The present number of Interstate Commerce Commissioners is five?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Five; yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And this increases the number to seven?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. To seven.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was it the opinion of the committee that they would get more expeditious action by having seven members than by having five?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I do not think that was the exact opinion about it. I will tell the gentleman how that happened, and in that way answer his question. Our bill—which would have been the minority bill—provided for the number of Commissioners to remain at five, as it is now, and with the salary that they have now. Our negotiations commenced with our Republican brethren who were asking for nine—I think this is the way it was—and they dropped down and compromised with us on seven.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not criticising the action. I was just asking for information. Now, one other question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the operation of this Commission, does it divide itself up into subcommittees? Say, if it wants to investigate a matter at New Orleans, is that matter investigated by the entire Commission, or is it investigated by a subcommittee, while another subcommittee may be operating in Boston, for instance, at the same time?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.. Now, I am not prepared to give a positive answer on that question, but I do not believe they have the right to do that. I do not believe this bill provides for that division or separation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just one more suggestion. If the Commission has to act as a body, then, in my judgment, the increasing of the number of Commissioners does not do a particle of good. We tried that with the supreme court of Missouri. It got behind with the docket, and we undertook to increase the number and expedite the business. But it did not do any good at all. As a matter of fact, I think it was a little slower. Then we passed a law dividing the supreme court of Missouri, which now consists of seven judges, into two branches, and of course they get along with the business all right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do they meet in different places in the State?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They meet in different parts of the same building, and then, finally, under certain conditions, if a party litigant is not satisfied with the judgment of one of these branches of the supreme court, they sit en banc.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. My opinion is that the Commission has no right to divide. My special attention had not before been directed to this, but I am quite sure that I am correct in the opinion expressed.

But we agreed with our Republican members of the committee about the $10,000. We thought that the salary ought to be large enough to command first-class talent and ability.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But it is not the law. The gentleman understands that it takes a majority of the Commission to render a decision.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then how could it be divided up?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I said I was not accurately informed on that, because my attention had not been specifically called to it, but we did agree about the salary and we did agree about the number. I know in the State of Alabama we have increased our bench to seven supreme court judges, and they meet at the same place—the capitol—and it is an able bench and disposes of the business of the court with dispatch and to the satisfaction of the bar of our State.

Mr. Chairman, I will now proceed to discuss section 4 of the bill, amending section 15 of the act to regulate commerce. It is the crucial point of controversy between the public and the common carriers. We may legislate about the suppression of rebates, the control of differential or relative rates and classifications, terminals, switches, and private cars. All of this is well enough in its place and time; but the real remedy, the only available tangible hope of fairly and equitably regulating common carriers is to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power, after a given rate has been challenged and after investigation found to be unreasonable, to decide, according to the judgment of the Commission, subject to the judicial review the Constitution guarantees, what shall be a reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to take its place, to be hereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged; the order of the Commission to become operative within thirty days and remain in force and be observed by the carrier unless the same shall be suspended, modified, or set aside by the Commission, or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction. Such are the requirements of the bill we are considering, which applies also to all interstate transportation service, including all charges, regulations, and exactions in connection therewith, whether for facilities provided by common carriers themselves or through arrangement with others.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that such power being conferred on the Commission will gradually eliminate the evils complained of in the matter of rebates, differentials, or relative rates. I have heard it said often, in the hearings before our committee by the able and distinguished representatives of the common carriers, that the evil and wrong of granting rebates, which they had been forced to participate in by reason of the acts of competing carriers, had under the provisions of the Elkins law been discontinued, and that now there was no ground or reason for such complaints. The President, in his recent Raleigh speech, an extract from which the Clerk has just read, used this apt and significant language:

Rebates are not now often given openly, but they can be given just as effectively in covert form.

And the President further says:

But, in my judgment, the most important thing to do is to give this administrative body power to make its findings effective, and this can be done only by giving it power when complaint is made of a given rate as being unjust or unreasonable, if it finds the complaint proper, then itself to fix a maximum rate which it regards as just and reasonable; this rate to go into effect practically at once—that is, within a reasonable time and to stay in effect unless reversed by the courts. I earnestly hope that we shall see a law giving this power passed by Congress.

In connection with the probability of rebates being given "in a covert form," I refer to an extract taken from the testimony of Commissioner Prouty, given before the Senate committee at a recent hearing. He said:

Senator NEWLANDS. Then what happened?

Mr. PROUTY. I am going to tell you what we did then. We directed the Baltimore and Ohio road to file a statement showing what shipments they had made during a certain time, and the rate of freight paid them for the transportation. It was necessary to do that in order to connect up with the evidence that we had. Thereupon they filed a statement showing a great many departures from the published rate. At the same time they sent to the Interstate Commerce Commission a letter. They said in that letter—now, I repeat from memory; I may get it a little wrong—but they said, in substance, in that letter that the roads in the territory in which they operated had habitually departed from the published rate; that was after they had sworn they maintained the published rate in that territory: "Now, for us, the receivers of the Baltimore and Ohio, we have gotten through, but we can not maintain the rate unless our competitors maintain the rate. We propose from this time on to maintain the rate ourselves, and we propose to see that they maintain it; but in order that we may do that, we ask you to call a conference of the railroad presidents in trunk-line territory."

Now, the Commission did, acting on that suggestion, invite every president of the trnk-line railroads to come to Washington. They came, all of them. Mr. Calloway was there for the New York Central; Mr. Thompson was there for the Pennsylvania Railroad; Mr. Murray and Mr. Cowan came there for the Baltimore and Ohio; Mr. Harris came from the Philadelphia and Reading, and Mr. Walters was there for the Lehigh Valley. I do not remember them all, but they all came there. Those gentlemen all said: "It is true; we have departed from the published rate. We did not like to do it, but we did. But we have gotten through. We shall depart from the published rate no more. If you gentlemen will only let bygones be bygones, we assure you that in the future there will be no discrimination under this law."

Well, I expect, perhaps, that we ought to have said to them, "You are a pack of consummate liars; we do not believe anything you say, and we will prosecute you if we can." But we did not think so; we believed exactly what they said, and we told them we did, and they went home and no prosecutions were begun on the facts which we had against the Baltimore and Ohio. Then we called, at the request of certain persons in the West, the presidents of all those lines, and they all came. Mr. Marvin Hewitt came; Mr. Bird, of the Milwaukee line, came; in all, thirty or forty; and we had the same sort of an experience meeting again. They all said: "We have sinned, but we have got through. Now, gentlemen, just help us to maintain the act to regulate commerce." We said: "We will do it." And they went home.

Now, I do not wish to pass any criticism at all on these gentlemen. I have not the slightest doubt that they meant precisely what they said. I think I know something about the difficulties under which they labored; but they did not maintain those rates for a month, probably. The thing went along in that way until the fall of the year 1901, or about one year after this first meeting with the presidents. We then obtained evidence of a departure from the published rate in the transportation of packing-house products and grain. They wanted to say once more: "We will stop if you will let us go." But we said: "No, gentlemen, we have heard this story once," and went to the court and obtained injunctions against these roads, because of departure from the published tariff. We passed the evidence which we had over to the Department of Justice.

The Elkins law, approved February 23, 1903, has undoubtedly accomplished some good. It prescribed penalties for anything done or omitted to be done by a carrier which if done or omitted to be done by a director or other officer or person acting for the carrier would constitute a misdemeanor under act to regulate commerce shall also be held to be a misdemeanor by such carrier. Failure to file and publish schedules or the granting of rebates makes the carrier subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 and not more than $20,000, but unfortunately the penalty of "imprisonment" was repealed, thereby removing the only penalty that would certainly restrain the officials of the corporation—the fear of going to jail. We had an object lesson some time since as to what a fine amounts to applied to one of these powerful corporations. The seven large corporations or combines that dictated and controlled the beef market of the cities of Chicago, East St. Louis, and other places were fined by the court $5,000 each for violating the provisions of the antitrust law against unlawful combinations to control the market price of an article or product, and thereby prevent competition, upon which judgment of the court an appeal was taken, and yet it was reliably said that that night these seven beef trusts assembled at their usual headquarters and equally divided between them the sum of $140,000, the unlawful profits of their combination for that one day. It is the county jail, the penitentiary, that such men fear. The imposition of a fine on the corporation has no fear for them, for it can be so easily returned to their pockets by a slight increase in their fraudulent transactions.

I am not disposed to quote and refer to the many decisions and constructions of courts on the question of the authority of Congress to delegate the rate-making power to a commission. I think to do this would be a useless consumption of the time of this committee. It seems to me that the fact that Congress passed the "Act to regulate commerce" nearly twenty years ago is quite persuasive of what authority the Congress has on that subject. We know that the Supreme Court of the United States in a number of cases coming up from different States has held that a State legislature had a right and authority to delegate to a State commission the rate-making power. My recollection is that quite twenty States now have delegated this power to their respective State commissions, and it is a fact that railroad development has not been hindered in those States. If the Supreme Court has held that the legislature of a State can delegate to a commission such authority, then it is certainly true that under the "commerce clause" of the Constitution the Congress has the right to protect shippers from injuries and impositions imposed by common carriers, and to this end to delegate to a commission the power to protect the rights of shippers by setting aside an unjust imposition in the shape of a rate and replacing it with a fair and just rate.

So, Mr. Chairman, I shall treat these two propositions as not being open, but closed.

The serious and important question is to determine the functions of a court after the rate has been declared and put in operation as a just and reasonable rate. Mr. Jefferson uttered in the early life of our Republic warning words of disaster that would befall our theory of government if the Judiciary Department of the Government invaded or assumed the functions of the legislative department. The making of a rate is accepted as a legislative function, and 'tis just as well established that a court can not, in a case primarily before it, or by appeal, engage in the performance of nonjudicial duties, such as reviewing the discretionary work of the Commission or the policy or judgment of the Commission in determining what is a reasonable rate. The court has, beyond question, the constitutional authority to declare that the rate is unlawful or that it is so low that it will confiscate the properties of the common carrier. It is hardly necessary to cite the authorities, that we are all familiar with, to establish that proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Speaking of a reasonable rebate, I desire to know if the gentleman can discriminate between reasonable and confiscatory. Does he draw any distinction between what is a reasonable rate in this bill and a rate that would be confiscatory?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think I understand the gentleman's question, and I will answer it to the best of my ability. I was going on to say that when you have conferred the power upon the Commission to investigate a challenged rate, with that limited authority placed upon the Commission—that is, a specific rate—how will confiscation ever result from it? It is the rate on one product only that is challenged.

That one rate among a thousand; that is the one that is challenged and investigated and declared to be unjust, unreasonable, and unfair. Does that lead to confiscation? If the Commission had power to regulate all the rates all through the lines of rates and change classifications, then it might lead to confiscation. I recognize the theory of confiscation, and I believe that this is the law, but I do not comprehend, where but one rate is challenged in a great number of rates, how the reduction of that one rate can lead to confiscation, for confiscation is scarcely probable when the Commission is restricted in its investigation to a specific challenged rate. Rates are fixed according to rebated products.

I believe still further than that, that the Federal court has no control whatsoever over this rate fixed by a commission, except where it is unlawful. What I understand unlawful to mean is that it exceeds or does not comply with the provisions of the act of Congress. The court has the right to pass upon the rate and say it is fixed so low that the railroad can not make a fair profit out of the rate as fixed upon its actual capital invested. That is all the power, in my judgment, that a Federal court has. It has no right to pass upon the policy or the expediency that induced the Commission to fix what, in its judgment, is a fairly remunerative reasonable rate. Why? Because the Commission, acting in that respect, was performing a legislative act.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Alabama that I had some difficulty right at that point——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have had a great deal.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky (continuing). Of determining how far the court could or would be given the power to review an order or decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It occurs to me that there is a distinction between a rate that would be confiscatory and a rate that would be reasonable. It seems to me that there is a margin between the two; that while the rate might permit the railroad company to make 1, 2, or 3 per cent——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Right there I admit that the court could prohibit the carrier from collecting an excessive rate, but it could not name a rate to be collected in the future.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, it is cases like this one of Nebraska—the case of Smyth v. Ames——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I recollect the case very well.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky (continuing). The Nebraska rate case (169 U. S., 466, p. 527) that has given expression to this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States:

> The idea that any legislature, State or Federal, can conclusively determine for the people and for the courts that what it enacts in the form of law, or what it authorizes its agents to do, is consistent with the fundamental law, is in opposition to the theory of our institutions. The duty rests upon all courts, Federal and State, when their jurisdiction is properly invoked, to see to it that no right secured by the supreme law of the land is impaired or destroyed by legislation. This function and duty of the judiciary distinguishes the American system from all other systems of government. The perpetuity of our institutions and the liberty which is enjoyed under them depend, in no small degree, upon the power given the judiciary to declare null and void all legislation that is clearly repugnant to the supreme law of the land.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Right there I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that is the theory advanced by Judge Grosscup, to the effect that a court having declared a rate unreasonable has the authority to declare what rate is reasonable in order to exercise the highest function of a court; that is, to assert and protect the property rights of a citizen. We ought to heed the admonitions given by Mr. Jefferson to keep the Federal courts from invading the legislative domain.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman from Alabama understands that I am in full sympathy with him in that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I know that you are. Mr. Chairman, I consider this a dangerous proposition. A commission clothed with the authority to fix the rate, of course, is acting under a law already passed by Congress declaring the provisions of the common law, that the charges of common carriers for the transportation of property or persons must be reasonable, and a commission is merely clothed with the authority to find out what is a reasonable rate and fix it, and call it a maximum rate. It is well understood that to regulate is legislative. The carrier must announce its charges. Right then two questions arise. The first is, Who will see to it that the rate the carrier publishes that it is to charge is collected of all shippers alike? The second is, If the rate is wrong, how is it to be corrected? This leads us, Mr. Chairman, to take a practical view of this bill, if it becomes a law. That is what we want to know. Suppose this bill becomes a law. Understand, there is no order that this Commission can make that can not be reviewed in the proper way within the constitutional limits by a Federal court. The railroads to-day have most of the benefit and protection of the law, and the people but little, if any. And when I heard these gentlemen, distinguished men from all parts of this country, talking before our committee about the constitutional rights that belong to the railroads, it was a matter of amazement to me how much of the Constitution belonged to the railroads and how little to the people.

Taking a practical view of this question, in the event this bill becomes a law, what procedure and remedies will it provide? Why, a man sits down and he figures the amount he has paid upon a hundred pounds of freight from his home to some other place, and he says to himself: "They have charged me too much; the rate is too high for the service rendered." Is there a man on this floor who thinks that man ought not to have the unquestioned right to go to some forum somewhere to correct that charge if it is too high? If it is unreasonable, surely he ought not to pay it and surely he ought to have a forum to which he can appeal, to say whether they have been charging him too high a rate or not, and at the same time correct the unjust rate. That is what this bill does. That is all it does in that respect, and when it goes to the Commission, what is done? Why, in his petition to the Commission the shipper states his grounds for believing that the railroad company has charged him too much. No one can hardly think that the shipper ought not to have the liberty of having his complaint investigated. The Commission notifies the common carrier to appear at a certain time, wherever the Commission is sitting, saying: "We want to hear you on this question. This man is complaining that you are charging him too high a rate. We want to investigate that." It is investigated, and the Commission decides that, in its judgment, the rate charged by the railroad is excessive. Is there any man here or anywhere else who says that such a charge ought to continue in operation when the Commission has found out that the rate charged is too much; that the railroad has not rendered service sufficient to justify it in charging that much? No man certainly contends that.

Then, to go one step further, they say to the common carrier: "You have charged this man too much. You must reduce the rate to such an amount, which we consider a reasonable charge." This rate is put in operation at once. What complaint is there of that? If the rate is unjust, then it is dishonest and ought not to be charged against the shipper. That is this bill. The railroad company have the right of appeal, just like all other interests in this country over which the courts have jurisdiction. They have the same rights that all the great interests of our country have, when they complain of a thing, to take an appeal and carry it up and have it reviewed. The only thing we say is that you must not stop the operation of the new rate fixed by the Commission unless stopped by constitutional methods.

Why? As I said just now, all of the protection at present is on the side of the railroads, and I am astonished to see how few constitutional rights the people have when I hear these railroad people talking about this question. I say this respectfully. Why should they have the right to stop the new rate? Under the operation of the law in existence to-day, when the railroad is able to give a bond and stop the enforcement of the new rate the case is not settled for five or six years. But if you put the new rate in operation it hurries up the common carrier to try to get the decision of the highest court. He wants the question settled. The rate is being collected, as fixed by the Commission. The railroad company ask: Well, how are we to be recouped? Where are we to get our damages? You have fixed your rate here at an unreasonable figure. The case has gone to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that the rate fixed by the Commission was unreasonable and unjust and that the rate formerly charged by the railroad was fair.

Where are we to recoup our damages and the money that we have lost under the operation of this unjustly low rate? The same rule applies to the damages of the shipper should the court hold that the rate fixed by the carrier and continued in operation was unjust. I say in answer to that, Mr. Chairman, that in a great public question like this, relating to such vast and complicated affairs and concerning the welfare of all the people of this whole country, you never are going to get a law absolutely equitable, fair, and just to everybody. There are bound to be shades of inequality in its operation. Let us get it as near correct as we can and do as near right as equity and the sense of justice dictates.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. This bill provides that when the Commission finds any rates imposed by the railroad company are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, etc., that it shall be within its power to fix a rate that is just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative, to take effect in thirty days and remain in force until it shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended and set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Now, coming to the practical workings of the Commission under this law, suppose a complaint is made of a rate and the Commission finds it to be unjust, discriminatory, and unreasonable, and they set it aside and establish a rate that they regard as good within the terms of the bill; can the railroad company institute an action in the proper tribunal asking for a restraining order against the Commission to prevent them from putting that rate into effect?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The railroad can, and base it upon two grounds; one that it is unlawful, and the other that the rate established is one that the railroad can not realize a just profit from; not including fictitious capital; you don't include that.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like the advice of the gentleman from Alabama in this respect. It is provided that if the Commission finds that if such rates are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the provisions of this act, to determine and prescribe what will in its judgment be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged. Now, I want to ask this question. Suppose there is a case before the Commission in which there is a discrimination or undue preferential rates are given, and these rates are not fairly remunerative, can the Commission grant relief?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does the gentleman mean not fairly remunerative to the railroad?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That would, under certain conditions, fall under the power of the Commission to regulate discriminations. It is not to be supposed that a carrier would fix it so low that it would not pay, unless for the purpose of discriminating against another line, and when that other line is crushed out, then raise the rate again. That, I think, would be discrimination, which this bill provides for.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman does not catch my question. As I understand the language, the Commission is confined in all cases where they make a decision to fixing the rate, and the rate fixed by the Commission must be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative. Now, am I correct in that or not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The gentleman is correct in that. That is the cardinal principle of the whole bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that. Now, in the event of a discriminatory rate or preferential rate granted by the railroad is not a fairly remunerative rate to the railroad, what jurisdiction will the Commission have?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. None in the world. The railroad fixes its iniatory rates, and we are encouraging them to lower the rates all the time.

Mr. FINLEY. And the Commission would have no jurisdiction at all?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. None at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that he intimated a point in reference to the power of the court that I have been wedded to for years, but I failed to get the committee to agree with me about it. I would like to have seen put into this bill—but my colleagues on the committee did not agree with me and I surrendered it—I would like to have seen put into this bill a provision that the order made by that Commission, believing it to be a reasonable, just, and fair one for the road, should not be suspended by the temporary restraining order of a court unless that court had given notice that it was going to act, and after hearing. I believe in that, and I tried to get it in there, but I failed.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I regret very much that he did not succeed in his effort.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I could not. I could not have everything my way. My colleagues know that I advocated that. I think that when a man's property rights are about to be passed upon they are sacred and dear enough to him to have any court give him notice, State or Federal. But that is not in the bill, so let it go.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. LAMAR. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama—I would not ask him the question if there is anything confidential about it—but I would like to know if these differences among his colleagues that he speaks of were without regard to party, or did his Democratic colleagues agree with him?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, no; and I am not disclosing any of the secrets of the committee, but, Mr. Chairman, first we had many meetings of the minority members, consisting of six. We talked over our views and talked with other Democrats about it. We fixed up our bill, and that provision I have just spoken of was in our bill, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] knows, and I do not recall any member of the minority dissenting from it. The minority members of the committee are in perfect harmony on this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; I know it was, and I am sorry it did not stay there.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We fixed up our bill, and then we got together with the gentlemen of the majority of the committee and they commenced talking to us, and one concession after another passed until finally we agreed, and we present the result to-day.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to ask if the Democrats were agreed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly. There were six of us, and we thought that we fared very well in the negotiations. At all events, we did our best.

Mr. LAMAR. And the gentleman then surrendered that point to the committee because the majority would not take it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I think the majority agreed with me on that point. I am quite sure they did.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is, the majority of the minority?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; of course that is what the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LAMAR] is talking about.

Mr. LAMAR. My only point, of course—and that is where I differ with my friend—is this, that if highly remedial legislation is demanded by the country, then I agree upon the propriety of all persons of that committee agreeing on a bill. That certainly carries great force to that point, but I do not agree with the gentleman that highly substantial remedial legislation should be surrendered in the committee to any majority to the extent that the House and the country are not informed in an official manner of the views of that minority, whether they be a mixed minority of Democrats and Republicans or a solid minority of Democrats. Otherwise when that whole committee unites and comes here with a general concession that the bill is the best thing they can get, with responsibility fixed on no one person or set of persons, how will you ever reach remedial legislation unless you make some person responsible. That is the point I make.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LAMAR] that I assume my part of the responsibility, just as my brother Democrats on the committee do, for agreeing to this bill. I believe it is the very best legislation, under all the circumstances, that we can get to give the people the relief they are demanding. I surrendered some of my views, just as other Democrats and Republicans did, to secure a bill supported by the entire committee.

Mr. LAMAR. I agree with the gentleman in one thing—that if the majority of the committee, whether Republicans or made up of Democrats and Republicans, will not take that provision, then, of course, it is proper to take every other good provision that is offered that the entire committee can unite upon. The point I make is this, that in dealing with a great question like this, where remedial legislation is demanded, somebody should have the responsibility for rejecting that legislation fixed upon them. To that extent the House and the country are entitled to know who objects and who does not. That is the point I make.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; I understand the gentleman's point. I am not trying to cast reflection on anybody in the world, and I will say further, now, since the gentleman from Florida has called my attention to it, that some of the best lawyers that I conferred with thought that there was a tinge of unconstitutionality about my provision, because the court undoubtedly has the constitutional right to issue a temporary restraining order—there is no question about that; you could not deny the Federal court the right to issue a temporary restraining order—and they thought that possibly my idea about it was throwing some obstacles in the way of the exercis of the constitutional authority of the court.

I did not agree with them, Mr. Chairman, but under the circumstances, being able men, and as we are making a compromise bill and trying to do the very best we could, I surrendered it with as much grace as I could.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama if all legislation is not largely a matter of compromise?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Why, of course; there is no question about that. We never would have any legislation if every man asserted his own views and adhered to them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would take up the bill there and look at pages 18 and 19 and let me read a word or two, beginning at line 24.

SEC. 16A. That after a decision or requirement has been made by the Commission in any proceeding any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same.

Now, the rehearing is confined to the party thereto.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I presume their administrators would inherit their rights, if they had any.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the administrator who has gone into this business since the Commission has fixed it is complaining against the rate. Now, then, being an outsider, he is not a party to the old suit and would not be entitled to go into that suit and have that rate refixed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. For a rehearing, you mean?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Of course he would not have the right, because he is not a party to the proceeding.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not amend by saying any party thereto or any persons aggrieved? That covers everybody.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not think you ought to give a man a right to appeal who is not a party to a proceeding.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You can give them the right——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Let him go and start at the beginning and file a complaint.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Say this man files a new complaint and charges this rate of, say, $1—to apply the rate we discussed a while ago—was unreasonable and hurt him, etc., the Commission would say that they have heard that case once and that he was not a party to that suit, so he can not reopen that suit.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee this is an entirely different—a new proceeding.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But it is about an identical rate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It may be just as you and I might have a lawsuit as to the title to a horse, but that would not preclude my friend Mr. JOHNSON, from South Carolina, from coming in and having a lawsuit with you about the title to the same horse—not at all. Judgment in the one case would not be a bar in another.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Commission, however, has fixed the rate for everybody, say, between Atlanta and Nashville, and this party not being a party in the old case can not get a rehearing of that rate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It does not exclude him from making an original complaint.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. How could he get a rehearing when he is not a party to the proceeding? I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee—I am very glad to have his suggestions—to the fact that the whole spirit of this bill, from the foundation of it, is that the Commission only takes jurisdiction and charge of a rate that is complained of. That is all it can do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If your theory was right, if the Commission passed upon one rate upon one railroad it could never pass upon another.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose a rate applied upon a particular commodity, say from Atlanta to Nashville, and this party was not a party to the old suit which complained about the maximum rate fixed, he not being a party to that suit could not get a rehearing, and that is the only relief afforded in this bill by which the maximum rate once fixed can be unfixed or refixed.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Tennessee explain what is to prevent the party from complaining about the rate the same as the other party did?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am looking to this—the Commission will say they have heard this—this is res adjudicata, that they have fixed this rate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But the rule of res adjudicata could not apply——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I do not know, but let us say it in plain English. I will say to my friend from Kentucky that if all were as plain spoken and as clear in writing as he is we would not have any mysteries about the law.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I agree with my friend that we ought to make the law as plain as it is possible for the English language to make it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. According to the practice laid down in what I have just read, that applies only to the party to that suit, and there must be a rehearing of that suit to change that rate. Now, that is my proposition——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope I am wrong.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong; absolutely so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I think it is worthy of your attention.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, I want to call the attention further, Mr. Chairman, in the short time left, to certain specific features of this bill that I have not yet mentioned. One important change made by this bill is that it corrects the disreputable midnight tariff. Under the old law the carrier could on three days' notice change its published rates. It enabled the carrier to give notice to favorite shippers to collect and gather together and have already for shipment, that a low rate would go into effect under notice of three days. The favored shippers would get the benefit of this low rate, then the rate would be raised—no shipper getting the benefit but those notified. Under this bill thirty days' notice must be given before the rate can be changed.

In section 3 there is an important matter. I read, Mr. Chairman, as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 14 of said act as amended March 2, 1889, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That whenever an investigation shall be made by said Commission, it shall be its duty to make a report in writing in respect thereto, which shall state the conclusions of the Commission, together with its decision, order, or requirement in the premises; and in case damages are awarded such report shall include the findings of fact on which the award is made."

The amendment relieves the Commission of useless and unnecessary labor by relieving the Commission of the duty of reporting "the facts" in every hearing and investigation it makes. It merely requires the Commission to report conclusions. This applies in all cases except as to damages.

I say to this committee that the change made from the old law in this paragraph, while it appears to be unimportant, is worthy of consideration and support.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wherein does it change it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The old law required the Commission to make a report of facts in every hearing or investigation and report the same to the court. It is certainly true that in a large number of cases it is entirely unnecessary to report the facts. The Commission states only its conclusions under the provisions of this bill. It leaves out the facts except in cases of damages. It is reported that there has been much delay and trouble in the Commission for years past on account of the requirement to report facts to the court.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As I understand, the old law is this: That in suits to regulate an unreasonable rate damages are also asked for, and in an excess above the reasonable rate the Commission has always on proper proof given what one might call practically a "judgment," although it is not that. They will order the railroads to refund the excess. They have always done that. Do you change that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; we do not change that. That is the law now. This refers to when the Commission has investigated a case, has obtained all the facts and the information, and the old law required the Commission to send those facts up to court. The court has nothing to do with them. The court passes upon the constitutionality of the rate—whether it is unlawful or confiscatory. The Commission is the arbiter of the facts. It draws, according to its own judgment, discernment, and discretion its conclusion from the facts. The court says whether the Commission's conclusion is unlawful or tends to confiscation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under the law as it is, if the carrier does not make the reparation that the Commission orders, they can go to the courts and sue. How do you change that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. My construction of the amendment made by this bill to section 16 of the old act is to strengthen and aid the procedure in the collection of damages awarded to complainants. I recall no other change in the old act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like just for a few moments to refer to the question of classifications. I am quite sure that I am correct when I say that our Commerce Committee were practically agreed that at this time it was best to leave out of this bill the power and the jurisdiction of the Commission to regulate classifications. Why? We are all, or should be, governed by reason in a matter of this kind. The whole theory of the act of Congress passed in 1887 for the regulation of the charges of common carriers was based upon the idea that the Commission only have the power to investigate a challenged rate, not rates generally; but if you give the Commission the power to regulate classifications, what does that mean? There are three general classifications. One is what is called the "Official classification," and embraces, I believe, all north of the Potomac and Ohio rivers; one that is called the "Western classification," that embraces territory east of the Mississippi River; and the other the "Southern classification," that embraces all south of the Ohio River and the Potomac River. That immense power, by the scratch of a pen upon the part of the Commission, to change all the classifications, to remove an article from one class to another, thereby regulating the price, is a far greater power in their hands than the right to declare what a reasonable rate is or to pass upon rebates and kindred complaints. And it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, far best to let that for the present stand as it is.

We all agree on that question; at least that is my recollection. But think about it! There are different classifications of commodities and products in the three great divisions that I have just named. Many of the same articles or products are placed in different classifications in these three "grand divisions." Again, articles and products unrelated to each other are classified alike and subject to the same rate, and if you give the Commission the right to transfer these dissimilar products from one classification to another it would be equivalent to giving the Commission power to initiate rates generally, which we all oppose. There is no great complaint about classification, as I am informed. Indeed, the committee has heard very little of it, and I pass it, Mr. Chairman, as a fit subject for other and future investigation.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Just there I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It is rather a surprise to hear the gentleman say there has been no complaint about the classification.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. There is not as much complaint about that, as I am advised, as there is about the rate.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if, in fact, that has not been one of the favorite methods the railroad companies have resorted to to increase their freight rates on articles?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I have heard so. Now, let me tell what I think about that. Inasmuch as we are going cautiously and carefully into this matter, let us patiently "bide our time" until we have acquired a little experience, and see how it has worked after we conferred upon the Commission the power to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate. That, in my opinion, is the "headlight" to guide us in settling all the demands of the public on our common carriers. Now I come, Mr. Chairman, to another question to which I shall briefly refer, and that is the relation of rates and differential rates. I said in the beginning of my remarks this afternoon that I believe that to confer the power upon the Commission to regulate a rate would tend a very great deal to relieve us of all of the embarrassment and evils in the relation of rates or of differential rates. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are differential rates? It is not an unjust or unreasonable or excessive rate, but it is the difference between the rates given to two competing localities on traffic for which they are competing. It does not concern the public. It is competition between two towns; that is what it is. And if the Commission has the power to regulate differentials, then would follow the authority to control relative rates in general between competitive localities. It is best to pause there, it seems to me.

Mr. WEISSE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Why, certainly.

Mr. WEISSE. Take the case of two railroads running into one city. They have a joint tariff, and there is absolutely no competition, and the shipper there can get no rates such as he would if he were in a town where there was but one road.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You admit the relation of rates does not imply an excessive charge?

Mr. WEISSE. Certainly it does.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It is on account of this competition between two towns. If the two roads have agreed to a joint tariff that is unreasonable, then the competition arising by relative rates is destroyed and the shipper ought to file a complaint against an unjust charge. The test of a differential or relative rate arises between competitive localities, and does not indicate that the rate is too high. It is not that the charge it too high, but that the common carrier is charging less upon certain conditions than are being charged on similar articles under different conditions. It does not concern the public as a question of excessive rates, and you certainly must be mistaken about that in your views. However, I admit it is a difficult matter and hard to solve.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman from Alabama does not mean to contend, as I understand him, that this power of the common carrier to differentiate or discriminate in rates between two towns is not in itself an exercise of a tremendous authority, pregnant with great evils. Do you not believe the same result is produced by the road unnecessarily discriminating between localities as if it charged an inherently exorbitant rate, so far as the effect upon the locality suffering the result of this unjust discrimination is concerned?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. All I have said and what I believe is that when you give power to the Commission to regulate the relation of rates, brought about by competition between two towns and having no connection with any complaint that the rate so charged by the carrier in either of the competing towns or localities is too high, then, in my opinion, you would authorize the Commission to prescribe rates without any regard to natural conditions and advantages possessed by one locality over another.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it will not also relate to competition between sections?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Of course.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is exactly in the condition which gives to 1,500 commodities east of the Missouri River in the United States a "blanket postage-stamp rate" from any portion of the United States to the Pacific Coast; and no point west of the Missouri River enjoys the same privilege in shipments to the Pacific Coast. Will this bill reach that sort of discrimination?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No, sir; except through the power that is given the Commission to fix the rate when an unreasonable rate has been charged. I may be wrong in my idea, but I think that the whole spirit, conception, and policy of the act of commerce was not along that line whatsoever, but it was to give the Commission power to regulate a rate complained of. So I understand that in the relation of rates when you give the Commission power to fix the relation of or adjust the differential rates you give a power to the Commission to fix a certain rate not because it is unjust or because it is an extreme rate, but because the Commission ought to recognize that all localities are of like conditions. Why, take, for instance, the hauling of corn from Iowa down to New Orleans, La., and taking the same quantity of corn and hauling it from Iowa to New York—to one of the Atlantic ports.

Do you say that the Commission ought to be given power to come in and disregard the physical fact that, figuratively speaking, you could roll a barrel of flour down from Iowa to New Orleans and you can haul two loaded cars to New Orleans while you can haul but one over the mountains to New York, to the Atlantic port? Do you think the Commission ought to have power to come in there and ignore this natural condition that God Almighty has created? Now, you do not think that? [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not think they ought to have any power to ignore this natural obstruction that may be in the way, but I do believe that the Commission ought to have power to determine upon some kind of just relation between rates from a point in Iowa to New Orleans, as well as a rate from a point in Iowa to New York.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then that gives the Commission power to interfere with competition, which is hostile to the very doctrine we are contending for.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I believe there ought to be some power given to the Commission. Of course it ought to be well guarded.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You admit the relation of rates as based upon competition between two competing towns does not involve an excessive charge?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; I think we are bound to make that admission.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. This does not refer to an extreme charge at all. No; not the extremely low charge nor the high charge, but the discrimination that is made by reducing the charge to one place to very much less than it is at the other place.

Mr. STANLEY. I am in hopes that the gentleman will interpret as much into this bill as possible and not interpret out of it. Do you not think that this very act of discrimination of which you speak, and which this bill does not take specific jurisdiction of, is, however, often and generally in itself evidence of an unreasonable charge?

For instance, the city of Henderson, a town of 15,000 people, is located about 10 miles from the city of Avon. The Ohio River, however, that potent factor in morals and commerce and ethics, runs between the city of Henderson and the city of Avon. There is a bridge charge for all freight going from the South over the Louisville and Nashville and over the Louisville, Henderson and St. Louis or any branch of the Illinois Central crossing that bridge; an excessive charge, called a "bridge charge," on all freights going north. All freights coming south pay no charge at all for crossing that same bridge.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We have regulated that.

Mr. STANLEY. The bridge is only about a mile and a half long. Now, I think a great many of these same differentials are in themselves evidence of an unreasonable charge; and wherever a differential indicates an unreasonable charge, does not the gentleman who has given this matter such profound consideration believe that that very differential should be taken as evidence of an unreasonable charge rather than to read into this bill or to argue into this bill the idea that the Interstate Commerce Commission under this act could take no control at all over differentials or over discriminations between long and short hauls or over differences in charges between two cities? While they can not do it specifically, I think, in a great majority of cases, this very difference between localities is the evidence of iniquity on the part of the common carrier.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. As a matter of course, this bill gives the right and authority to the Commission, if a rate is put down so low as not to be fairly remunerative to the carrier to accept that low rate as the maximum rate, for the carrier to charge, and prevent the discrimination that the carrier had in view by making such a low rate. This bill, while declaring the reasonable rate fixed by the Commission is the maximum rate to be charged, yet it retains that necessary flexibility which permits and encourages the carrier to reduce its rates, but not for the purpose of discrimination. This bill, in its operation as a law, I think, will regulate all such matters, even though no special provision is in the bill as to classification, differential, or relative rates specifically.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman from Alabama think that the provision for the control of bridges in this bill will cover that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, yes; in this bill we have made bridges, side tracks, terminals, and all instrumentalities of commerce, owned or hired special cars, icing charges, etc., subject to the control of the Commission under the provisions of the "act to regulate commerce."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see it is after 5 o'clock, and I am about through with what I had to say.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the subject of classification, I should like to ask him if he thinks that this bill affords any remedy for a case like the one that occurred some years ago that was heard before the Interstate Commerce Commission, where the railroads put a more finished product, like ground coffee, into a lower classification than green coffee, or, for instance, put flour into a lower classification than wheat, which of course would result in a discrimination?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. This bill does not control that.

Mr. STEENERSON. This bill would afford no remedy for that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not at all. It does not give the Commission the power to regulate or control classifications.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman will recall the coffee case, where burnt coffee was controlled by a trust, and the fact that they put that burnt coffee into a lower classification than green coffee gave the coffee trust an absolute monopoly by reason of that classification. The gentleman says there would be no remedy for that in this case under this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. None at all. They have no power over classifications, but you can reach that injustice under other provisions of this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I should like to suggest to both parties to that colloquy that with the specific power to correct any specific rate, I do not think there is any trouble about righting such a wrong as that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not at all; and the Commission will have ample control over every character of complaint that concerns or relates to an unjust charge by a common carrier against any shipper. On that line the provisions are broad and comprehensive.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Speaking about the question of classification, I want to know how this bill would affect the case which I am about to state. There was the hay case—I thought the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] was going to refer to that. The gentleman is familiar with the hay case.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They took hay out of the sixth class, where it paid the lower rate, and put it into the fifth class where it paid a higher rate, just arbitrarily, and my information is that they put about $2,000,000 into the pockets of the railroads and took that amount out of the pockets of the farmers. The Interstate Commerce Commission ordered them to put hay back into the sixth class, where it had always been, and the railroads refused to obey the order. They took it then before Judge Wing, and he held that the Commission had no power to order that, because it was an indirect making of rates.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The bill does not give any control of classification, simply for the reason that we thought it was a great power to put into the hands of the Commission and that we had better pause a little while and have a little experience on the subject. We have a great deal now by putting into the hands of the Commission the power to regulate and control rates and to replace an unreasonable rate with a reasonable one. I think, as I said, that that is the headlight that will illuminate the whole thing, and when you give that power and it is properly exercised by the courts and the Commission and the railroads and the people you will regulate all these troubles that you are talking about that are so manifold.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it requires any great amount of brain or knowledge of how to make hay or anything of that sort to enable them to order the railroads to take hay out of the fifth class and put it into the sixth class, or vice versa?

Mr RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I do not think it requires any great amount of experience.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Going back to the question of differentials, the rate on cotton from Tennessee to New England is 55 cents; from Tennessee to North Carolina, 57½ cents. Now, do you contend that if the rate from Tennessee to New England is so low that it is unremunerative that it is a just rate, and do you contend that nothing should go into this bill allowing it to be corrected in case it is unjust and unremunerative?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I do not contend that. If I undertook to answer the full statement of the gentleman I ought to know what conditions surround it on which the railroad has acted before I could fairly express an opinion. We are seeking here, Mr. Chairman, to do the very best we can. I said at the beginning that the bill did not meet my entire approval, and I do not suppose there is a man on the committee that indorses everything in it. I have tried to point out the advantages of the bill one way and the other. We have mutually conceded, conceded so much that the Democratic minority did not come in with a minority report. I frankly say, Mr. Chairman, and there is not a man on this floor that will take issue with me, that if we had brought in a minority report on any of these questions that have been suggested here, that when it came to offering it as a substitute most every gentleman would have voted first for the substitute, then for the Republican bill. [Laughter.]

Why not get the best we can out of it and meet it in a spirit of concession, patriotism, and proper regard for the railroads and great regard for the interests and welfare of the people who are demanding at the hands of Congress some remedial legislation?

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. Suppose, for the sake of argument—it may not be a fact—that the political representation on that committee were divided, that the Democrats on that committee wanted more extreme, more remedial, or, if you choose to call it, more radical legislation, and the Republicans disagreed with the minority entirely. It would not affect this House on that legislation if we all finally voted for the Republican bill, even though you had made a minority report. Isn't it the power and privilege and duty of the minority to force the majority in action by parties to either accept an amendment carrying remedial legislation which they do not want, or vote them down and take the responsibility?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I do not agree with the gentleman. I do not think a man ever makes anything for himself or his district or his country by advocating and pushing forward extreme ideas of his own. I never believed that.

Mr. LAMAR. I did not say extreme ideas of yourself or mine.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You said extreme ideas.

Mr. LAMAR. I said legislation that might be considered extreme, but not extreme in your opinion or in mine, but such remedial legislation as would compel the majority to either vote for or accept it and take the responsibility—such remedial legislation as the Interstate Commerce Commission has recommended for fifteen years and which has been recommended by the President.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What is the gentleman talking about, the private car? We think this bill presents the remedial legislation indorsed by national Democratic platforms, indorsed by the President, and I feel certain that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LAMAR] will indorse it.

Mr. LAMAR. The general proposition. I will ask the gentleman this question: Do you believe that there is an essential relation between the taxes imposed by the way of passengers and freight rates, interstate rates, and the capitalization of these roads?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Essential relations?

Mr. LAMAR. Essential relation between freight and passenger rates and the capitalization of these roads?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have no doubt that a great deal of the capitalization of railroads is fictitious, but the courts would not consider this fictitious capitalization when they determine the question of a fair remuneration or profits based upon actual capital of the common carrier.

Mr. LAMAR. Does the gentleman believe that there is an absolute essential relation between the passenger and freight rates and the capitalization of the railroads?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman explain? I do not understand his question.

Mr. LAMAR. I thought my question was obvious; I must be very obscure. The point is this: The railroad is overcapitalized.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The gentleman means fictitious capitalization.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes. Does not the gentleman believe that if the railroad proposes to earn dividends on stock so inflated and overcapitalized, interest on bonds overinflated and overcapitalized, that it must necessarily increase its rate of freight and passenger earnings over what they would do if there was no such inflation?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; I have been discussing that point. I think there is a relation between these things and overcapitalization, and I think there ought to be no consideration of such false capitalization by the courts.

Mr. LAMAR. Let me ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill touching the question of overcapitalization?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No. The law covers that.

Mr. LAMAR. In this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. There is no need of putting it in the bill; the courts of the country have passed upon that.

Mr. LAMAR. Does not the gentleman believe that this Congress ought to make a declaration upon that point?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; there is no need of it. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to answer all questions that have been asked me frankly and honestly. As I have said, this bill does not express fully my views, and I do not suppose it expresses the views fully of the chairman or any other member of the committee.

It is just the aggregation of what we could get from each other by mutual concessions, and I believe that with this great question now being so agitated, there being so many men throughout the country for different and diverse purposes talking about these matters, that this bill being agreed upon by twelve Republicans and six Democrats will have a splendid effect upon all the country, temporizing, mollifying, and to a great extent relieving these passions, prejudices, and assaults sometimes indulged in on these great economic questions. I believe this harmony and unity manifested here in our agreement on this bill will check the tendency of Government ownership, and, if I may be permitted to say so, will have a fine effect upon the Senate of the United States and get the legislation that the people demand from this Congress. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, leave will be so granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad-rate bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

MODELS OF NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the bill (S. 90) providing for the deposit of a model of any vessel of war of the United States Navy, bearing the name of a State of the United States, in the capitol building of said State was ordered to a third reading and passed by the Senate yesterday. I understand that the bill has not been forwarded to the House of Representatives, so the usual motion to request the House to return it will not be necessary. I simply desire to enter the motion to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill No. 90 was ordered to a third reading and passed will be entered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know that at this particular time the reasons for asking to reconsider the bill may be called for, but I should be very glad to have some suggestion from the Senator as to the reason for reconsidering it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course it is not necessary that I should give any reason, but I will give a very good reason. It is that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs reports to me he had requested that the bill should not be acted on in his absence, as he has some amendments to offer to the bill. That is the reason.

Mr. HEYBURN. I perhaps owe it to the chairman and the Senate to say that, referring to a suggestion as to whether I should ask to call it up by unanimous consent, the Senator desired that I would not do it; but when it was reached regularly on the Calendar, of course, I regarded it as occupying a different position and allowed it to go through in its regular course. I understand that the Senator finds no fault about it. I do not know the nature of the amendments the Senator desires to present, and I regret very much that action upon the bill should be delayed by a reconsideration of it. Of course the amendments might be entirely acceptable. I introduced the bill and naturally feel the interest in it one does for measures he proposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Notwithstanding the Senator introduced the bill, I think the committee that had charge of the bill is the responsible party in this case, and of course we must defer to the wishes of the chairman of the committee, who gave notice, I understand, to the Senator himself that he proposed to offer some amendments to the bill.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

PAPERS ACCOMPANYING CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. PATTERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon rise to morning business?

Mr. FULTON. Yes; concerning a matter which occurred during the presentation of morning business yesterday. I wish to refer to it briefly, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me. It will take only a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do, if it is simply a brief matter.

Mr. FULTON. In the RECORD of this morning appears a statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday, as follows:

> Some days since I introduced a bill for the relief of A. W. Tedcastle, guardian of Frances L. Snell, which was referred to the Committee on Claims in due course. With it I filed certain papers, which is customary. An additional paper came in, which I sent up to the Committee on Claims to be filed with the bill. I was there informed that under the rule—a rule of which I had no knowledge whatever—it was necessary to present such papers in the Senate. It seems to me to be a useless regulation, but if that is the rule I now present the paper to be referred to the Committee on Claims, to be filed with Senate bill 3421.
> Mr. KEAN. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have been a member of the Committee on Claims for some years, and I never knew such a rule to be made.
> Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I sent the paper up yesterday, and was informed at the committee room that by an order of the Secretary of the Senate, acting under a rule, as I suppose, it had to be presented in the Senate. It was something entirely new to me, etc.

I was not in the Chamber at the time the statement was made or I should have taken advantage of the opportunity then to explain why the clerk of the committee had made that request.

The practice has been, when papers have not been referred with the bill but are afterwards tendered to the committee, to request that they be referred through the Senate. That practice arose not out of any rule, as I am informed, but from the request of the file clerk of the Senate, who stated, and it seems to me quite reasonable, that he could not keep track of papers or the fact that papers had been referred with a bill unless they should be referred through the Senate. The practice does not obtain where papers have been referred with the bill and additional papers are desired to be sent in to accompany the bill. In that case the reason for offering them through the Senate does not seem to apply.

I wish to say, however, that as far as I was concerned—and one reason why I bring up the matter is because I am chairman of that committee—I was simply seeking to follow the practice of the committee which had obtained, as I was informed, for some years prior to my accession to the chairmanship. If, of course, it is not desired, and Senators think it is a useless and unnecessary rule, I have no wish to enforce it; but it does seem to me when simply a bill has been referred to a committee and afterwards papers are desired to be sent in through the committee to be considered in connection with the bill it is proper that they should go through the Senate in order that the record may show that papers accompany the bill in case a question should ever arise thereafter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just a word on this subject.

Some years ago the Secretary's office, through its file clerk, made a request upon the Committee on Claims, which seemed to be a very reasonable one, that instead of receiving ad libitum in the committee room from everybody, attorneys and others, papers of which they knew nothing, where a bill had been presented and where it was sought to add papers that they should be passed across the desk of the Senate so as to get into the Journal. It seemed to me to be a reasonable request, and my instruction as chairman of the committee to the clerk having the matter in charge was that when a Senator presented such papers to ask him if he would as soon present them in the Senate; and if he had objection, or if they were presented by an attorney, that then the chairman would take charge of them and pass them across the desk, so as to get them where there would not be undue responsibility resting upon either the file clerk or the clerk having charge of the papers in the committee.

Now, in that committee there are thousands of bills and thousands of papers. At the end of a term of Congress perhaps 1 or 2 tons of papers are turned back into the office of the Secretary of the Senate. Attorneys come in the committee room, sometimes three or four or more at the same time, and ask to see papers. It is not a practice to allow them to take papers away from the committee room, but they are permitted to examine them there on the committee table. The opportunity for the loss of papers or for the abstraction of papers is very great, and I think any practice that shall guard the papers and relieve the responsibility of the clerk of the committee and the clerk of the Senate is a good one. I considered it proper that it should be the rule to make that request.

I am not surprised that a member of the committee should have stated on the floor yesterday that he did not know of the rule, because it is a matter which is largely with the clerk and the chairman.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am in the same position with the Senator from Massachusetts. I was not aware of any such rule or any such custom, and I have been a member of that committee for a great many years until lately. I was chairman of it for some years. I do not object to the rule if Senators understand it, but the first time I heard of it was on yesterday. I do not myself think it is a very necessary rule. I think when the clerk of the committee receives papers, if he does his duty, he makes a record of them, and there is a record then of all that have been filed, and they become from that time a part of the files of the Senate. Still, I am not informed as to the custom.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just one word further on this matter. I should be as willing to see the practice done away with as anybody else if the Senate sees fit. However, it was largely a matter between the committee and the Secretary's office. If the clerk failed to record a paper, the Secretary's office had no way of knowing that that paper had been presented, and when an inquiry came—and sometimes in a way rather not very deliberate—for papers that were filed and the Secretary could not find them they were charged over to the clerk of the committee. It was merely a matter of making a check for the file clerk in the Secretary's office.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that the Secretary of the Senate has nothing to do with the papers until they are turned over when the Senate reaches the end of a session. The clerk of the committee is the custodian of the papers until such time as the Senate adjourns.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I brought the matter up simply to explain that I was not seeking to invoke any new rule or innovation. I had simply instructed the clerk to follow what we understood had been the practice in that regard.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. PATTERSON was assigned to the vacancy upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MOROCCAN CONFERENCE AND RELATIONS WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, as I stated yesterday, I do not find myself in entire harmony with my colleagues on this side of the Chamber upon the matters involved and cognate to the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which has been made the basis of speeches to the Senate on the subject of the Moroccan conference, the Santo Domingo treaty, and the temporary arrangement pending the ratification or rejection of the treaty between the United States and Santo Domingo. I know the matters involved are considered of prime importance by my colleagues, and for that reason I have given everything that I think is reasonably connected with the subject the most serious consideration, and I have reached my conclusions after such consideration, and what I shall say is said from a sense of duty.

I do not see how the Monroe doctrine, Mr. President, can be made a party question, and the discussion that has occurred shows that the Monroe doctrine is the very basis of the alignment of Senators upon these questions. There never has been party division on the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine has divided parties, but it has never yet been made a distinctive party feature by the existing parties at whatever period of our country's history. From the time it was enunciated by President Monroe, in 1823, until the present time leading Democrats have taken opposite views as questions have arisen in which the doctrine was involved, and leading Whigs and leading Republicans have also taken opposite views upon every such occasion. I can see no reason now why, in so far as the Monroe doctrine is connected with a controversy in which Santo Domingo is the central figure, the extent of the Monroe doctrine or the question as to whether under precedents it is applicable or not should be made a party question.

I am very frank to say, Mr. President, that I approach the discussion of it in a very friendly spirit to the President of the United States. The honor was conferred upon me of being selected, at a banquet given in honor of the President at Denver on his emergence from the mountains after the celebrated bear hunt early last spring, to respond to the toast "The President of the United States." In that response I said a great many nice things about the President, and I did not say them simply from a desire to be complimentary to the guest of honor of the occasion, but because I felt the truth of every word I said, and that what I said was due to Mr. Roosevelt, in view of the record he had made as President. I have no knowledge of anything transpiring since to cause me to abate one jot or tittle of the esteem in which I held him then as a statesman, as a citizen, and the first magistrate of this country.

It is not, Mr. President, that I do not differ with him in many things. I can not agree with him in his Philippine policy. I can not agree with him in his attitude upon the statehood question. I believe that his influence is used in that controversy for the purpose of inflicting a great injustice upon the people of one of the Territories that is involved. There are many questions between the President and the Congress, and between the President and the Senate perhaps, in which I differ with him. But I have no hesitation in saying that, whatever the difference may be, I have implicit faith in the integrity and the patriotic spirit that moves the President on all public questions.

Mr. President, I believe that Democrats should feel distinctively friendly and cordial to the President of the United States. If the Democratic party had elected its candidate at the last election, I doubt whether we would find him now as earnestly and zealously and fearlessly engaged in maintaining the rights of all of the people as against certain wealthy classes who consolidate their wealth to yet further increase it and their political power. Nor can I forget, Mr. President, that only last spring and summer the President in a trip throughout the South met the men who had worn the gray, and taking them by the hand addressed them as comrades and praised them for their patriotism. I feel that upon that occasion and upon other occasions he accomplished more than any other man before him in annihilating sectionalism and producing a feeling of oneness and of unity between the people of the United States of all sections that had never existed before.

I recall also, Mr. President, the merger suits that the President caused to be instituted, and the results. I am not unmindful of the fact that to-day in the city of Chicago, through his representative, he is waging battle in behalf of the rights of the masses against a coterie of the wealthiest and the most powerful men of the United States. Nor am I unmindful of the fact that he stands forward as the champion of railroad legislation, which the people, irrespective of party, have been demanding from every section of the country.

Our Democratic friends are free to assert that he is but giving life to a Democratic principle and a Democratic measure; and I was gratified when but the other day I read that the committee of the House of Representatives having in charge that great railroad measure had unanimously agreed upon a bill embracing the material provisions which the President had advocated.

Mr. President, the President of the United States within the past three or four years has been carrying on a struggle the like of which has not been known since the contest of Andrew Jackson with the moneyed power of the land, and he has shown as bold a front and as high an order of courage and as sincere a determination as did Jackson to wage that war to a triumphant success, if it is within the power of any human being, through the agency of his office or otherwise, to win success against such powerful odds.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I feel that, unless there is some overwhelming reason to the contrary, every Democrat in the land should whenever he can, when it does not force him to violate a conscientious duty, stand by the President and uphold him and lead him to feel that the people are behind him in his every effort in their behalf.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I have no favors to ask from the White House. I have received none, nor do I want any. I do feel, however, that in my attitude I am giving voice to the feelings and the convictions of the Democratic masses of the West, and if we could reach the innermost thoughts and feelings of the people of the South I believe it would be found that I am but echoing their sentiments and feelings in behalf of the President.

Mr. President, I want to refer briefly to the Morocco conference, and to tell why, so far as that conference is concerned, I can find no rational objection to the presence there of American commissioners. This country was a signatory to the treaty of 1880 or 1882. This country was invited to send commissioners to that conference. The claim is made that we have no business in European controversies except where the commerce of the country is involved or the rights of American citizens are to be maintained. As I read the history and meaning of that conference, there is hardly anything but commerce involved in it. It is a struggle between Germany and France for the commerce of Morocco, a country of 10,000,000 people, rich in possibilities of commerce, and which, as other influence may penetrate that country and other methods of living may find their way into its midst, will become a greater customer year by year for the civilized nations of the world.

As I understand the controversy between France and Germany, it is this: France insists that Morocco shall be within its zone of influence, and that it shall have the right to police that country by reason of frontier contiguity. Germany stands for the open door; and as I understand the "open door" it means that the commercial possibilities of that country shall be open to the exploitation of the commercial interests of every other country, each country upon a perfect equality, and that no nation shall have any recognized superior advantages in a commercial sense by reason of treaty or international preferences.

Mr. President, under such circumstances, if what I have said is true—and I believe my position can not be disputed—I can not understand how it is that the United States has not an interest, a commercial interest, in the Moroccan situation; for if the claims of France shall win, it means that France shall be the dominating factor; that its commerce shall have preference, and that it will have a more or less controlling influence in the markets of that country; while, if the open-door policy shall prevail, the United States, as every other country, will be upon an equal footing, its extent of commerce being determined by the claims to preference that are inherent in quality, in cheapness, and in the commercial enterprises of its commercial representatives.

Nor can I see, Mr. President, how, whatever the outcome may be, the United States shall be in any wise embroiled. If there is no agreement and war should result, the only outcome as to the United States can be that the United States will stand aside and let the European war go on. It is there looking after its own interests and can have no interest in peculiarly European subjects.

We interfered in behalf of the open door in China, we interfered in behalf of the open door in Manchuria, and if there is any reason why the influences of the United States, exerted through American commissioners, when the United States has been invited to participate, should not be used for the open door in Morocco I have failed to discover it.

For that reason, Mr. President, I am glad that this debate has occurred. It has been an instructive and interesting controversy. It set Senators to thinking, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr BACON] did a great good to the country and to the Senate in the persistency with which he urged his right to discuss these questions upon the floor of the Senate. Having heard the controversy and thought out the matters for myself, I have no question, so far as my ability will permit me to see the right, but that there is no room for criticism because the President sent commissioners to Algeciras.

Mr. President, with reference to the Monroe doctrine, I have said that parties have divided in themselves upon that subject ever since it was announced in 1823. We know that Jefferson urgently insisted upon Mr. Monroe declaring it as it was announced in his celebrated message. We know that President Polk was an ardent supporter of the Monroe doctrine in its extremest claims. We know that Calhoun and Clayton and other Whigs and Democrats, if not opponents of the Monroe doctrine, at least were in favor of the narrow limitation of its extent and power. Reading the political history of the country, you will find that the scope of the Monroe doctrine has been a prolific source of controversy from 1823 to the present time. Even the eloquent Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] announced in his strong and powerful speech that he differed with President Cleveland in the view he took of the Monroe doctrine as he applied it to the boundary controversy between Venezuela and Great Britain.

Mr. President, in 1825, when the question of sending commissioners to the Panama Congress was up in the Congress of the United States, men of both parties divided upon the extent to which the Monroe doctrine should be carried. In 1825, again, over efforts to transfer Cuba either to France or England, the matter was discussed and the same division was found to exist. Again, in 1835, over the occupation of Honduras by Great Britain, and in 1848 when Yucatan asked the United States to protect it against falling into the hands of European powers, the division continued, and John C. Calhoun, then one of the most powerful factors in Democratic councils, insisted that the Monroe doctrine ceased to have efficacy with the dissolution of the Holy Alliance, the cause that brought it into existence. Again, in 1850, in the negotiation and ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with President Taylor in the White House and Mr. Clayton Secretary of State, the Monroe doctrine was almost abandoned by the adoption of that treaty. By it the distinctive American policy that had been in force from 1823 was set at naught and Great Britain was permitted to have a potent influence in the affairs of the American hemisphere. True to the nature of that nation, the treaty had hardly been ratified when in the seizure of the Bay Islands she showed her contempt for everything that had been before uttered in favor of the dominance of the United States in the affairs of this hemisphere.

Again, Mr. President, in 1862, Spain reoccupied Santo Domingo over the protest of the United States. Spain, like France, took advantage of the great war that was then engaging all the powers and wealth and men of this nation to attempt to reestablish itself in some of its earlier possessions on this hemisphere; but in 1865, at the close of the war, Spain abandoned Santo Domingo, knowing full well, with the hands of the United States disengaged and from the attitude of the United States toward the possession of Mexico by French troops, that its tenure of power would be brought to an end by force if necessary. Then, again, it was asserted with great vigor in 1895, by President Cleveland in the boundary dispute between Venezuela and Great Britain, and again in 1902 and 1903 when the good offices of the United States were tendered to bring about arbitration in the serious controversy between Venezuela upon the one side and Great Britain, Germany, and Italy on the other.

The Monroe doctrine has always been a fruitful source of controversy, for it is almost impossible for controversies to arise between any nation of the Western Hemisphere and a European country without the Monroe doctrine being most intimately connected with it.

Mr. President, in the statements of the Monroe doctrine from either side upon the floor of the Senate I do not believe that its full scope and meaning, as found in the message of Mr. Monroe himself, have been made clear, although unquestionably it has been fully comprehended. That doctrine embraces far more than the declaration that the institutions of European governments shall not be extended into any part of the American continent. President Monroe must clearly, from the scope and language of the message, have had in mind other nations than those composing the Holy Alliance. It was a declaration that was intended for all time, to meet every emergency that should exist by reason of any improper interference by any nation in the Eastern Hemisphere with any country or nation upon the Western Hemisphere.

That such is the case is very plainly manifest from the language of President Monroe, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to it from the message itself. At the time the message was sent there were controversies between Russia, the United States, and Great Britain over boundaries in the north Pacific Ocean. Russia claimed the entire coast line from Bering Straits down to latitude 51°, and the United States claimed a large portion of the same line by virtue of the discovery of the Columbia River in 1802 by Captain Gray, in the sbip Columbia, from Boston, and also by virtue of a previous treaty between this country and Spain. Great Britain laid claim to a large portion of the territory. An effort just at that time had been made by the Emperor of Russia to secure a convention composed of commissioners of the three powers to, if possible, settle that boundary dispute. In the message of 1823, President Monroe, discussing this controversy, announced the doctrine of noncolonization, which is as much a part of the Monroe doctrine as is the declaration that is so frequently quoted and relied upon.

He said:

In the discussions to which this interest has given rise and in the arrangements by which they may terminate the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents—by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

The American continents—

That part of the Monroe doctrine, Mr. President, has been lost sight of time and time again by many Senators and Representatives, judging from the speeches which have been made in both branches of Congress. But turning to the part of the message that has been considered the authoritative statement of the Monroe, or American, doctrine, we find that even that has not, as a rule, been accepted in its full scope and meaning. President Monroe said:

We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers—

Referring by the words "those powers" to the Holy Alliance, which consisted of every European nation except Great Britain and Rome. Repeating, I read:

We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

But the declaration does not end there, Mr. President. After addressing himself to the Holy Alliance, in the sentence that immediately follows he addresses himself to the nations of the world without reference to any alliance, and he lays down a proposition that is ample authority for almost any step that may be taken to prevent the oppression in any way of any nation upon the two American continents. This is his language:

With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged—

Now, mark the language—

we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

I have little doubt, Mr. President, but that this latter declaration, so much broader than the one before it and usually quoted, has influenced Presidents from time to time in the stand they have taken in their dealings with European countries.

The message of President Monroe in 1823 was the most momentous declaration that had been made by any nation since the Declaration of Independence. The Declaration of Independence announced the independence of thirteen colonies and their forcible manumission from the control of a single Government; the message of Mr. Monroe announced the independence of the entire Western Hemisphere from any and every European nation that sought to possess or colonize any part of the hemisphere or who should undertake to oppress any of the nations upon it.

It is wonderfully gratifying, Mr. President, to find how the father of Democracy stood in that trying moment. But a very short time before the message was sent to Congress we find Mr. Jefferson is writing a letter to President Monroe. In November, the message having been promulgated the following month, Mr. Jefferson, writing to President Monroe, said:

Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe.

Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs.

A pretty broad and comprehensive statement.

Never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs. America, North and South, has certain interests distinct from Europe and peculiarly its own. She should, therefore, have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom.

Mr. President, with reference to the Monroe doctrine, I stand for its robust, manly, and unqualified support, in its broadest sense. I stand for preventing any European nation from oppressing any of the nations of this continent. Not only do I stand opposed to colonization or to the introduction of European institutions into the Western Hemisphere, but I believe it is the duty of this Government to prevent the oppression by any European power of any of these nations; for oppression tolerated will ultimately lead to subjugation and to possession, and this country can not afford to permit to any further extent than now exists any European nation to hold a foothold on this hemisphere. In case of war we do not desire them to hold any part of the American continent as a base for supplies, a base for organizations, or a base for aggression.

If the purpose of the Holy Alliance had not been arrested, a tremendous war between the consolidated nations of Europe and the United States had become inevitable. Mr. Monroe's message averted it. Had it not been for the announced attitude of the United States at that time, the Holy Alliance would not have been so soon disrupted, and doubtless both Spain, France, and Great Britain would have attempted to possess themselves of different parts of the South American continent.

The Monroe doctrine is not due so much to Great Britain as the Senator from Massachusetts suggested. I find on reading the history of those times that although Mr. Canning, the foreign minister for England, did urge a joint declaration on the part of the United States and Great Britain against the intrusion of European institutions into the American continent, for several months before Mr. Monroe's message Mr. Canning had retired from the field and the message then and there announced a wholly American doctrine.

Mr. Canning's theory was that there should be a joint announcement. The American minister said to Mr. Canning, "Will you recognize the independence of the South American republics?" To that Mr. Canning demurred. The American minister insisted that Mr. Canning should give a categorical answer to that proposition before he would concur in his views, and urge his Government to unite with Great Britain. This Mr. Canning refused to do.

It is perfectly evident that even then Great Britain had her eyes upon the vast and unoccupied areas of the South American continent, and that it hoped, with the defeat of the aims of the Holy Alliance, it would have an opportunity to possess for itself a considerable part of the South American country. To prove that I am right about the abandonment of the proposition by Mr. Canning, I have only to read a short extract from a letter written by Mr. Rush, the American minister, to the American Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams. Referring in this letter to Mr. Canning, he said:

I saw him again at the foreign office yesterday, and he said not one single word relative to South America, although the occasion was altogether favorable for resuming the topic had he been disposed to resume it. I therefore consider that all further discussion between us in relation to it is now at an end.

I only read enough to show that by the word of Mr. Rush, the American minister, Mr. Canning had become silent upon the question, and when I turn to what Mr. Monroe himself said you will find that Canning had altogether retired.

Mr. Adams, in a letter to Mr. Rush, uses this language:

It has been observed that through the whole course of the correspondence and of the conferences, between Mr. Canning and you, he did not disclose the specific information upon which he apprehended so immediate an interposition of the European allies in the affairs of South America as would have warranted or required the measure which he proposed to be taken in concert with you before this Government could be advised of it. And this remark has drawn the more attention upon observing the apparent coolness and apparent indifference with which he treated the subject at your last conferences after the peculiar earnestness and solemnity of his first advances. It would have been more satisfactory here, and would have afforded more distinct light for deliberation, if the confidence in which his proposals originated had at once been entire. This suggestion is now made with a view to the future, and to manifest the disposition on our part to meet and return confidence without reserve.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator from Colorado is entirely right in saying that this doctrine is immediately at least of American origin exclusively without any intermixture of English, but is not the most that was suggested this, that Canning first originated the idea. I do not think anybody ever went any further than that.

Mr. PATTERSON. What Mr. Canning suggested was——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A joint declaration.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes. It was not that the United States should take an attitude of hostility to European encroachments upon this continent, but that Great Britain and the United States should unite in a joint declaration to that effect.

I can have no doubt but time and time again, as the existence and the aims of the Holy Alliance were discussed, the necessity of some such attitude upon the part of the United States was discussed. Many things were said and done doubtless that are not found in the public archives of the country. But no one can read the correspondence, so far as published, between leading American statesmen and between Mr. Rush and Mr. Canning without realizing that the idea involved in the Monroe doctrine was not a new one; that the necessity of preventing the Holy Alliance from reconquering for Spain and France the South American republics had been in mind and discussed; and in view of the fact that after Canning had practically abandoned the field, as the result of communications between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson and other leading lights of his own party, Mr. Monroe determined that the step should be taken, and the message was but the fruition of thoughts and purposes that for a long time had been in the minds of those great statesmen.

I am not disposed for a moment to detract anything from whatever merit Great Britain and Mr. Canning may be entitled to in this matter. There is one thing we are certain of—that the compelling motive in the mind of Mr. Canning was to preserve to Great Britain the tremendous commerce it had secured in the South American country as a result of war between France and Spain and Spain's revolting American colonies.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not true that under the proposition by Mr. Canning England was to share in the determination of what powers might gain a foothold, and that England was not included within those excluded?

Mr. PATTERSON. None of the correspondence that I have read has suggested anything of that sort.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator if he understands that England retained, under Canning's proposition, the right to obtain or to retain any foothold in those countries?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no question about it. I have no question but that Great Britain and her distinguished minister had in mind that at some time in the future those vast and practically unoccupied areas of country on the Western Hemisphere might be seized for England's glory and the enhancement of its wealth and power.

Mr. HEYBURN. And is not that the distinguishing feature between Mr. Canning's proposition and the Monroe doctrine? The Monroe doctrine excluded even England, and Mr. Canning's proposition did not.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think that is so, Mr. President, and I thought I had made that pretty clear, that had Mr. Monroe in his message had in mind the proposition of Canning he would have simply inveighed against the Holy Alliance. But he proclaimed against every nation of Europe. He proclaimed against the colonization of any portion of the Western Hemisphere whether by Great Britain or Spain or France or any other country, and in that the Monroe doctrine was made the American doctrine. It is that doctrine which should be maintained in its full strength and vigor, and the governing parties of this country should not hesitate, as necessity may require, to from time to time advance it, so as to make certain that the aims the fathers had when this doctrine was announced shall be secured.

Mr. President, without dwelling any longer upon that, I desire to refer briefly to the concrete question that has brought up this controversy. Of course that includes the Santo Domingo treaty and it includes the present existing arrangement. To my mind the case of Santo Domingo is an exceptional one. There is no other independent nation in the Western Hemisphere situated as is Santo Domingo, and the peculiar thing about it is that all parties agree upon the conditions in the island. The President tells us that it is socially and financially and industrially in a state of chaos. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] denounced in the most scathing and unbounded terms the conditions there. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], quoting some other person, suggested—and if I have not the exact words I have the sentiment—that the quickly succeeding governments of the island was "a tyranny tempered by assassination."

Then, again, Mr. President, Santo Domingo has appealed to the United States for succor in its dilemma. That is not denied. Some insinuations have been made that force of some kind, moral or otherwise, has been used to bring about that appeal. But there are no evidences whatever of it. As I listened to the speeches that were made, as I have read such literature as is obtainable, I have no doubt but that some wise and prudent men of power and influence in Santo Domingo, though their skins may be black or yellow, have appealed to this country to lend Santo Domingo a helping hand in the hour of its peril.

With a relatively small population, the figures placing it from a half million to 750,000; living in a country in which 10,000,000 people could be supported in comfort, if not in luxury; revolution succeeding revolution, by reason of the ambitious and abandoned characters who have temporary power and influence within its limits; the necessities of the succeeding leaders of revolutions leading them to negotiate loans with citizens of different countries, vast in amount, and from which in many instances Santo Domingo received but little of the money that its bonds nominate; with two or three nations, perhaps more, demanding that the claims of their citizens shall be paid; with her custom-houses already in possession of American officials by reason of the award in the case of the Santo Domingo Improvement Company, and other nations clamoring for admission into its custom-houses, the President has seen fit to listen to the appeal and to attempt, by means of a treaty, to give to that almost abandoned country such help as he may legitimately and constitutionally give.

This, Mr. President, is the way I understand the facts as they exist, without calling upon the imagination or fancy. So far as I have stated the facts, there is no dispute, and the only question is whether an exceptional case has been made out in which the United States may of right and should morally respond.

I listened with great interest, indeed, to the splendid speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], rich in historical allusions, rich in illustration, profound in its political philosophy, and I heard him describe the condition of Santo Domingo and maintain that the duty of the United States was to let Santo Domingo alone, to remain in silence, in inactivity throughout it all, and then I wondered what was to be the outcome.

The real condition of Santo Domingo is not denied. The necessity for some helping hand is not denied. If the United States shall abandon Santo Domingo, then one of two things must inevitably happen: Either some European power will take possession of its custom-houses, and, by reason of the paucity of its revenues, hold them for an indefinite time until possession, in their mind, will seem to give them title, or else the people of Santo Domingo are to be abandoned to a fate that would be worse than that of the infernal regions.

We hear no stories of efforts upon the part of the governing classes of Santo Domingo to uplift the people, to educate them to better ideas of government, to turn their faces sternly against revolution and the leaders of revolutions. We do not learn of the betterment of the condition of the people. On the contrary, we have a continuing descent into the depths of misery and degradation and the horrors of internecine war. Under those circumstances is there to be no relief? Shall no appeal be heard? Is there no duty devolving upon the United States to such a country when we rigidly insist that no European power shall interfere to perform the duties we are asked to perform?

If an appeal had been made to Great Britain and France to take possession of the custom-houses of Santo Domingo, to mold its financial policy, its tariff and internal taxation, to guide and help and succor Santo Domingo, and they had listened approvingly to the appeal, is it possible that with the Monroe doctrine and what the great men of the country have said and done and what Congress has done upon the strength of it, we would have stood idly by and permitted possession of Santo Domingo to be taken for such a purpose?

Mr. President, I do not doubt that those who are inveighing against the help that is to be extended by the United States to Santo Domingo would be denouncing an Administration which would stand idly by while that process which I have suggested was going on. It is either the surrender of this island to the control of nations whose citizens are its heavy creditors, to shape its fiscal policy, to manage its revenues, to execute its laws, and to guide, control, and uplift it, or else it is help from the United States along the lines of the treaty or an abandonment of that island. To permit the continuance of present conditions within it and their accentuation when relief is asked for and it can be given would be almost a crime. I am frank to say, therefore, Mr. President, that I look with some degree of favor upon the proposition that the United States shall extend its helping hand, its advice, its aid and counsel to this island in its present desperate situation.

One thing I noticed, Mr. President. The President in all communications upon the subject has declared time and again, oftener than it seemed to me necessary, that under no circumstances, under no provocation would our presence in the island under this treaty be used for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement; that when the purpose of the treaty is completed the United States would withdraw, leaving the island, it is to be hoped, in such a condition that if wise and patriotic and able men are there to guide it its subsequent history will be better and brighter than has been its past history.

I have no question about the sincerity of the President in his declaration that he has acted upon those appeals merely for the purpose of helping a weak and a suffering people in the day of deep extremity, and that when the help has been given and the good has been accomplished the United States will entirely withdraw and leave the country to work out its own future destiny.

Mr. President, as to the pending arrangement, if I thought it was the carrying out of the treaty when there is no treaty, I would oppose it as earnestly and as zealously as anybody could. Let us see what the situation is. I recollect the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] suggested that for a year before the treaty by which the state of armament upon the Lakes was determined, the United States and Great Britain had observed the provisions of the treaty subsequently ratified. But that is hardly akin to this. I do not admit the parallel, because one was merely a negative course—one of omission, one of letting things alone pending the determination by the treaty-making powers as to whether the treaty would exist or not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No. The citation which I made of the treaty between this country and Great Britain was in response to a request of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] for any Senator to cite him an example of a treaty whose provisions were carried out before its ratification. I at once remembered this instance and cited it for that purpose, not as a parallel, though since the Senator mentions it, I call his attention to the fact that it was not a passive, not an inactive acceptance of the treaty, but the powers—the United States and Great Britain—actually did proceed to the active disarmament provided for in the treaty during the whole year, and that that had to do with the determination of a very great and permanent policy which affected the destinies of both powers.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Indiana is right, and I am right. Great Britain proceeded along its lines in dealing with its own. The United States proceeded along its lines in dealing with its own. It was not the intermeddling in any way of one nation with the affairs of the other. The procedure was upon the theory, doubtless, that the treaty would be ratified.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. There was no question about it; and the powers were simply engaged in making preparations for it. But this is somewhat different, and the only question is whether it is of such a character that the President may be charged with usurpation of authority and of going outside of the Constitution in doing what he has undertaken to do.

Mr. President, there is no warrant in the Constitution for the Monroe doctrine. If you will read it line by line, seeking for authority, there is no authority there. The Monroe doctrine is but the exercise of what may be called "the national police power," which rises in states and nations above constitutions and above written law. It was declared, not because it was in the Constitution, but because the great statesman who announced it became convinced that the very life of the nation depended upon its exercise. It was a question of policy after all, under the unwritten authority of the Constitution.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator let me ask him, Is it not the law of self-defense?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is the law of self-defense. The police power in state and nation is always the law of self-defense. It may be to protect the state or the nation from epidemics, from outlawry, from invasion, from destruction, in whatever form it may come and from whatever source, and when the executive of a state or nation realizes that the life of the country is in danger or may be endangered in the exercise of state or national police power it is his duty—his bounden duty under his oath of office and under the constitution—to take the necessary steps, whatever the necessary steps may be, to defend the life and maintain the existence of his country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is a power inherent in government.

Mr. PATTERSON. Necessarily so.

So it is not a conclusive argument that authority for the existing temporary arrangement is not found in the Constitution.

Now, let us see what has been done, as I understand it. Here, Mr. President, is the initial letter from Mr. Dawson to the Acting Secretary of State, which led to the present arrangement, and I read this from a paper that was made a part of the speech of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] at his request. Being a dispatch, unnecessary prepositions and conjunctions are omitted, and I will read it literally:

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

Under pressure foreign creditors and domestic peril Dominican Government offers to nominate a citizen of the United States receiver southern ports pending ratification protocol, four northern ports to be administered under the award. Forty-five per cent total shall go to the Dominican Government, 55 to be deposited in New York for distribution after ratification. Creditors to agree to take no further steps in the meantime and receiver to have full authority to suspend importers' preferential contracts. Italian, Spanish, German, and American creditors, except the Improvement (company), accept unconditionally. Belgian, French representatives will recommend acceptance. Some modus vivendi absolutely necessary. I am ready, if desired, to start for Washington, D. C., 28th, to explain details and modifications of plan obtainable; the whole matter can be held open during my absence.

DAWSON.

I have not heard this statement of conditions denied: That the creditors of all nations assented; that only the Santo Domingo Improvement Company, whose claim had been settled and was in process of liquidation by possession of the custom-houses, objected, and that company believed, as a matter of course, its claims should be preferred. The proposition was, if the treaty shall be ratified, the revenues of the country shall be maintained for the payment of the claims of our own citizens as well as of the citizens of other countries, 55 per cent of the revenues to be used for the payment of expenses of collection, the residue to go into a New York bank to be distributed subsequently among the creditors.

Is that the enforcement of a treaty? I do not believe it is, Mr. President. It is an arrangement to maintain the funds so that they may be accessible to be used for the purposes contemplated in the treaty, if the treaty shall be ratified. We could not be there except at the request of Santo Domingo. The President makes it clear that were it not for the extraordinary conditions he would not pretend to any necessity or right to go there. It is in the cause of good government, for the benefit of the people of Santo Domingo to maintain its affairs in such a state that if the treaty shall be ratified the end it seeks shall be secured, that the efforts are being made.

Mr. President, the Senate must soon settle this whole controversy. The Senate can soon settle it. Bring the treaty before the Senate; and it should be brought before the Senate at an early day. It should not be hanging fire as it is. Bring the treaty before the Senate; and if the Senate shall reject it and the President shall continue the arrangement, then he is open to the criticisms that have been made. But if the treaty shall be ratified, it seems to me there is no one who has given attention to the question but will admit it was a wise provision, for by the saving of the revenues trouble with the creditors will be the earlier disposed of, and Santo Domingo will be the earlier at liberty to proceed in the working out of its destiny.

I will not, Mr. President, enlarge further upon these matters. I am no man's keeper and nobody is my keeper. Every Senator has a right to his views and his convictions. I have no question whatever about the good faith and the patriotism of every Senator upon this floor, whatever his attitude may be upon this question. I have no question, Mr. President, about my motives; and I want to say it was with some regret, knowing the feeling that some of the Democratic Senators have upon this question, that I took the stand I feel myself impelled to take, and that if I did otherwise I would be untrue to myself and untrue to my country as I understand my duty to my country to be.

I have no fear of the President. I have not the slightest idea that he has any purpose of usurping powers that belong to some other Department of the Government. I have no idea either that he is a perfect man. I think that he has some of the weaknesses that pertain to almost all of us—emotional at times, hasty at times—but withal, Mr. President, I can not doubt his patriotism. I have no suspicion that he is attempting to pave his way for a renomination. It would be so utterly inconsistent with his character, in view of his declaration, and were such a thought harbored in his mind no man who entertains the high opinion of him that I do could entertain it for a moment longer.

I just want to read the statement that he made, admittedly his statement, no equivocation or qualification attempted. And when was it made, Mr. President? I recall that when Mr. Bryan was nominated for the Presidency he said he would not be a candidate for a second term and would not accept a renomination. There were those who said it was the declaration of a demagogue; that he sought thereby to elevate himself in virtue above other candidates for the Presidency and other Presidents; that he was not sincere. I have no question whatever about the sincerity of Mr. Bryan when he made that statement, for I talked to him in person about it long before he made it, and he said it was his determination to make it, because he believed that whatever might have been properly done in the early days of the Republic the power now centered in the hands of an Executive was so tremendous that the temptation to use it for the future aggrandizement of the President should not exist.

But Mr. Roosevelt made this declaration after the election. He remained silent during the election. He was charged with all sorts of ambitions and improper purposes. But after the election, with that unprecedented popular majority, in the calmness following the excitement of the campaign, realizing the tremendous popular indorsement the people of the country had given to him, he gave utterance to the pledge:

I am deeply sensible of the honor done me by the American people in thus expressing their confidence in what I have done and what I have tried to do. I appreciate to the full the solemn responsibility this confidence imposes on me, and I shall do all that in my power lies not to forfeit it.

On the 4th of March next I shall have served three and a half years, and this three and a half years constitute my first term. The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination.

Mr. President, if this declaration had been made upon the ground of his personal convenience or his desire for the pleasures and ease of private life, there would not be the same binding obligation upon him to observe it; but when he placed it upon the broad and patriotic ground that he desired to emphasize the necessity for the rule of but two terms inaugurated by Washington and observed by all the great Presidents since, he would be worse than base should he, under any circumstances, accept another nomination.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, it was a brave and a patriotic declaration. He had served but three and a half years. He had not been elected to his first term. His accession to the Presidency followed the bullet of an assassin. More ambitious men could have tortured the conditions under which he reached his first term and the fact that he had served but three and a half years of it, into no interference of any kind or character with the rule established by Washington. He has added additional force and power, and given additional virtue to the rule of Washington. Having attempted to understand his character, and comprehending it in some degree, at least, I regard it as an utter moral and physical impossibility that he should be a candidate for another term or should accept the nomination, however parties might attempt to force it upon him.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, we may consider him patriotic. We should look with friendly eyes upon him. He may be ambitious. Why should he not be ambitious? I do not believe that it is his ambition to overturn the institutions of our country or any single important or material one of our institutions. I do not believe that he is ambitious to be conspicuous in badness or in lack of patriotism. If he has ambition (and who will say it is too high for any man to aim at achieving), it is an ambition to earn and to deserve a niche in the country's Pantheon by the side of Washington and Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln. Whether he will reach——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Colorado how much time he desires to occupy?

Mr. PATTERSON. A very few moments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily until the Senator from Colorado finishes his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There is none; and the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Whether we shall ever reach that ambition remains for history to tell. In the meantime, Mr. President and Senators, I feel it my duty to give to the President such humble support as I can, where I believe in my heart he is right, responsible to my own conscience and sense of duty, and to oppose him wherever I believe he is wrong; and I believe the country will approve the political party that moves along those lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what his purpose is?

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to make a request.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield for that purpose.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time that Senate bill No. 88 may be taken up on Wednesday, February 7—which is a week from to-day—for consideration, and that its consideration may be continued until the bill and the amendments are disposed of and a final vote taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that day?

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that a final vote be taken on that day on the bill and amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 88, known as "the pure-food bill," be taken up on Wednesday, February 7, and voted on before adjournment on that day.

Mr. ALLISON. That it be disposed of on that day?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume the request does not mean its consideration may not be proceeded with prior to that time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator ought to put that in.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the request may be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 88, known as "the pure-food bill," may be voted on February 7 before adjournment. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. TELLER. I do not mean by an objection to it that I am opposed to the pure-food bill, but I am going to object because I do not believe that is a proper way to do business. I do not know that the discussion is over. I do not know but that the bill might be passed or defeated long before the date fixed; but there are other matters before the Senate, and this practically takes all other business out unless by unanimous consent it is displaced. If we make an order of that kind it displaces anything that may be before the Senate on that day, unless an arrangement is made beforehand or upon that occasion to the contrary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, if the Senator will withhold his objection, we can arrange it so that anyone wanting to speak will have the opportunity to do so. I have taken some pains to ascertain what Senators want to speak on the bill, and I think if the Senator will not interpose an objection, when it comes up at that time we will be able to make an amicable arrangement.

Mr. TELLER. When it comes up at that time, so far as I am concerned, I will be ready to vote on it. I am ready to vote on it now; but I do not like that system of business, and I do not intend that it shall prevail here if I can avoid it, and therefore I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado objects.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES], for a matter that I understand will take but a few moments.

BRIDGE AT SHREVEPORT, LA.

Mr. PILES. I report back from the Committee on Commerce without amendment the bill (H. R. 12314) to amend an act approved February 3, 1905, authorizing the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for that purpose?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield for that purpose. I understand there is special reason why this bill should be passed at once. The Senator from Washington will state the reason.

Mr. PILES. The reason is that the time within which the work should have been completed expires to-morrow or the next day, as I understand from the Senators from Louisiana, and the bill merely extends the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act of Congress approved February 3, 1905, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.," be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from February 3, 1906."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM WILSON.

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment, so that I may have a little pension bill passed? The beneficiary of the bill is ill, and probably will not live long.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey for that purpose.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2012) granting an increase of pension to William Wilson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William Wilson, late of Company B, Thirty-first Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. I should not have made the request unless it had been a very urgent case.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yielded with pleasure. I understand the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has a matter of some urgency that will probably occupy only a moment. I will yield to him.

PORTS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his kindness. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3318) to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at Port Harford and Monterey, Cal.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "proceed to," to insert "San Luis Obispo;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the collector of customs at San Francisco is hereby authorized to depute an officer of the customs from his collection district to proceed to San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, or Monterey in his district for the purpose of receiving at those places the entries of vessels arriving there in ballast and of clearing them with cargoes of petroleum only in the same manner as if they had proceeded to San Francisco before entry. The actual necessary expenses of the officer shall be paid by the private persons concerned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal."

CHARLES T. RADER.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Montana provided the bill he is interested in does not lead to any discussion.

Mr. CARTER. I am obliged to the Senator.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 538) for the relief of Charles T. Rader.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "by," to insert "contiguous;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles T. Rader, of Fort Logan, Mont., be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to select by contiguous legal subdivisions, at such place or places as he may desire in the State of Montana, 480 acres of unoccupied and unappropriated nonmineral public lands subject to entry under desert-land laws, and when such selection shall be by him certified to the Secretary of the Interior patent shall be issued to said Rader for the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 7048. An act changing names of Pierce place, Blake street, Swann street, Cedar street or place, and Oregon avenue to Wheeler street, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE CIVIL WAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to Senate resolution, dated January 16th instant, requesting the President "to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the best interests of the service, the petition and accompanying papers of certain officers of the Army, veterans of the civil war, retired from active service for disability contracted in the line of duty and who have not yet received the benefits of the act of April 23, 1904," I transmit herewith the petition referred to, with a printed brief of the case, together with a report of the Military Secretary, United States Army, and accompanying copies of War Department records enumerated by him bearing upon the subject, including an opinion of the Attorney-General and his letter of August 18, 1905; also copy of a report of the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, dated November 23, 1905, approved by the Secretary of War, giving a detailed résumé of the case and its present status and expressing the opinion that the case being one which is not susceptible of an executive remedy relief can only be afforded by the exercise of legislative power.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 31, 1906.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] if he can inform me as to whether or not any Senator on that side desires to discuss the pending measure to-day?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know of anyone, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there does not seem to be an overwhelming interest on either side of the Chamber in the discussion of the bill. I will ask the Senator if he thinks we might not come to a vote on it at this time?

Mr. MALLORY. I can only speak for myself, Mr. President. I am ready to vote on it now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If no further amendment be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, before that question is put to the Senate, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger	Dick	Kean	Pettus
Allee	Dillingham	Kittredge	Piles
Allison	Dryden	La Follette	Proctor
Ankeny	Elkins	Latimer	Scott
Bailey	Flint	Long	Smoot
Brandegee	Foraker	McCumber	Spooner
Bulkeley	Frazier	Mallory	Stone
Burkett	Frye	Martin	Sutherland
Burnham	Fulton	Newlands	Teller
Burrows	Gallinger	Nixon	Tillman
Carter	Gamble	Overman	Warner
Clark, Wyo.	Gearin	Patterson
Clarke, Ark.	Hansbrough	Penrose
Clay	Heyburn	Perkins

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will not insist on a vote being taken to-day on this bill. It is true that this subject and kindred subjects have been discussed by the Senate during the last three or four sessions of Congress, and probably a vote ought to be taken at an early day, but it occurs to me that some future day, several days ahead, should be selected for voting upon a bill of this importance. We ought not to attempt to take a vote on it to-day. I presume the Senator from New Hampshire hardly intends that a vote shall be taken on the bill to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire was not rash enough to expect the final vote to be taken to-day, but no one seemed to be ready to speak and there did not seem to be anything else to do just at that moment. I will, however, take the liberty at this time to ask unanimous consent that this bill, together with the amendments pending and amendments to be offered, be voted on before adjournment three weeks from to-day.

Mr. TELLER. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I should be willing to vote on this bill this afternoon if the Senator insists upon it, but for the reason I before stated I am going to object. I do not by that mean to say that I am going to keep the bill before the Senate until the time the Senator has indicated, for I think we might be able to vote on it probably before that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to fix a time before then, if the Senator wishes.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator might give notice that on a certain day he is going to press the matter upon the Senate. I think that would be proper, but I do not believe in fixing a day which might displace matters of more importance.

Mr. GALLINGER. During my service here I have noticed that the general practice has been to get consent to vote on a bill and not to give notice that it would be unduly pressed at any given time.

Mr. BACON. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. This bill has not been fully debated, and so far as it has been debated it has been by set speeches, which have not received the general attention of the Senate to the extent that they merited. I should take the liberty of suggesting to the Senator that, if possible, instead of asking for a day upon which a vote shall be taken, he would first set a day on which the bill should be taken up by sections for amendment, with a view thereafter to fixing a time for a vote. Such debate would possibly disclose differences of opinion and result in an agreement upon amendments, which might bring the Senate to a condition where it would be prepared to say that it was ready to vote.

I confess that while I have some decided views upon the general subject of a ship subsidy, so far as the details of the bill are concerned, I have not heard such debate on it as I should like to hear. I am not on the committee which reported this bill, and consequently I am dependent on the information which I get in general debate as to certain features of the bill. I do not know whether that is a practicable suggestion or not; but I simply for myself wish to say that I should like to hear a somewhat informal debate between Senators, rather than set speeches now and then, to which possibly very few Senators give any attention.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill is in precisely the attitude which the Senator desires it to be in, and it is optional now; and not only that, but I invited any Senator on either side to proceed now to discuss it section by section, or in any other way that he should see proper. I made the observation a moment ago, as there did not seem to be an overwhelming desire to discuss the bill on either side of the Chamber and there did not appear to be anyone who cared to discuss it, that we might have a vote on it.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I suggest that, unless the Senate desires to transact some other business, I should like to ask a question for my information. I say "for my information," because I do not present it in the way of argument, unless the fact should be as I understand it. Is it, or not, true that there is any other civilized nation which gives a general subsidy to every steamship or sailing vessel, as the case may be, engaged in foreign trade, regardless of the question as to where it goes, or the distance traversed by it—in other words, where the tonnage and the length of time consumed in the voyages are the considerations?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I can safely say to the Senator that it is true.

Mr. BACON. In what case?

Mr. GALLINGER. France does it.

Mr. BACON. Gives a general subsidy to all ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. BACON. Not devoted to particular voyages, but extending to all ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. To ships carrying cargoes.

Mr. BACON. Would the Senator be prepared, when this subject is again up, to give us definite information upon that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. BACON. Not only to France, but as to any other nation also. I think the Senator would instruct us very much and enable us to come to some conclusion on this matter if we could have a succinct statement from him as to what is done in this regard by the different nations.

The object of my suggestion is this: The question of aiding in the development of navigation on certain lines, for the purpose of improving trade with certain countries, is not altogether a new one, even to us. We have, in the way of mail subsidies, etc., made some efforts in that line. It has occurred to me that if anything on this line is done, it ought to be—I mean on the line of ship subsidy—it ought to be in the nature of an effort to encourage trade between this country and particular countries with which we wish to develop trade, and that it ought not to be of a general character, which would give these subsidies to vessels in the main engaged in foreign trade with countries with which we have already great trade.

I am not prepared to say that the bill could be so framed as to entirely meet with my support or approval on those lines, but, if it is possible to bring me to the support of a bill of that kind, it would be with a view to the development of trade between this country and other countries with which we have now little or no trade and between which countries and ours there are now no direct lines of communication.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I recollect, put some inquiry to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I think it was as to whether or not he favored certain subsidies, as the Senator from New Hampshire termed it, to certain lines of railway for the purpose of developing increased mail facilities. I am very frank to say that I have myself voted for such increased mail facilities; and it is possible that a bill might be framed which would be very much less objectionable to my mind than one which proposes simply to give a subsidy to every ship which is engaged in foreign commerce, according to tonnage, as I understand this bill to be, regardless of the question as to the country to which it goes and regardless of the question of the speed at which it goes or the number of trips it makes or its mileage, but based solely, as I understand that part of the bill, upon the tonnage of a vessel and the length of time it is engaged, whether it goes rapidly or slowly, or whether it carries much freight or little freight.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that under this bill a vessel could go from the United States and take a cargo to Cuba, then be gone a year trading in foreign countries, and then come back to the United States and get a subsidy.

Mr. BACON. That is the impression I have had.

Mr. MALLORY. They are to be paid $5 a ton for that service, for carring the freight of foreign countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, that is not likely to happen, and the Senator knows it is not likely to happen. It might happen possibly, but just there the Senator, having been a member of the Merchant Marine Commission—I am addressing myself to the Senator from Florida, Mr. President——

Mr. MALLORY. I beg the Senator's pardon. Will he kindly repeat the observation?

Mr. GALLINGER. I made the observation that that is not likely to happen, and I think the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know about that. I think it might happen.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator thinks it will happen?

Mr. MALLORY. If the class of vessels which the Senator contemplates are built—I do not think, however, there will be any such class of vessels built—the subsidy will go to tramps in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they are not built, then it can not happen.

Mr. MALLORY. If you give this subsidy to ships, irrespective of the country with which they trade, the tramp ships will get it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I am not surprised that objection is raised to this bill. Objection will be raised in this body to any shipping bill. The Senators on the other side know that I have not been impatient when amendments have been offered to this bill.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say to him in all frankness that if a bill is framed and presented to the Senate under which there will be a reasonable mail subsidy for the encouragement of the opening of navigation and the establishment of steamship lines between this country and other countries where we now have little or no trade and with which we wish to develop trade, I am inclined to think I would give it my support; but I am not willing to give my support to a bill which proposes to give compensation or a subsidy based upon tonnage and the length of time in which it is engaged in navigation, regardless of where the ship goes and all other considerations.

I state that simply that the Senator may consider whether or not the suggestion contained in his last remark, that any bill will have objectionable features about it, is distinctly or properly replying to the suggestion which I made. I had not made the statement in a definite shape, but I now make it that while I am opposed generally to ship subsidies I am impressed with the importance of the opening of trade with nations and between this country and other countries where we now have little or no trade upon the basis of proper and reasonable and liberal compensation for the carrying of the mails. I am willing to aid in the establishment of such lines.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, two different objections have been raised to this provision. A few days ago, in a very elaborate and able argument, the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], who was a member of the Merchant Marine Commission and is a member of the Committee on Commerce, informed the Senate and the country that this subvention would not operate to secure any ships. On the other hand, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is afraid that it will, and in that way it is objectionable.

This subject, by a mandate of the Congress—not because anybody that I know of wanted to perform the service—was placed in the hands of a commission composed of five Senators and five Members of the House of Representatives. That Commission devoted nearly two years to considering the subject, depriving themselves of leisure that they would have been glad to have enjoyed. They have framed a bill which, in the judgment of the majority of the Commission and in the judgment of the majority of the Committee on Commerce, is a wise measure. As I said before, it is not such a bill as I would have preferred, because I would have gone much further; but we did what we thought was best, all things considered, and it is now before the Senate; and I repeat my suggestion that it is open to amendment, if the Senate wishes to amend it.

I am not going to unduly press this bill. I know how foolish that would be and how absolutely impossible it would be to press it to a vote if Senators object, but I hope it may be considered in precisely the way the Senator from Georgia suggests, and that we may have a debate on all the debatable features of the bill.

I recall, Mr. President, very clearly the fact that when the bill which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. FRYE]—a man who has given more thought and more time to this subject than perhaps any man has ever done in the history of the country—was before the Senate a few years ago, the chief objection urged to it was that it gave subsidies or subventions to the fast steamships and neglected the cargo carriers of the country, and now the objection is made that the pending bill gives subventions to cargo carriers.

The Merchant Marine Commission felt that we ought to encourage that class of vessels. We felt that we ought to have some vessels of our own to carry such products as the cotton from Georgia, Alabama, and South Carolina, and the Commission were of the opinion that if we had such vessels they would get better freight rates than they are getting to-day from foreign steamship companies, which are carrying the products of the farms and factories of this country to foreign markets. I do not think the Commission or the Committee on Commerce made a mistake in that regard. I believe it is entirely a wise provision. I believe it will result in the building of a great many American steamships; that it will restore the American flag to the oceans of the world, and that, as a result, we will have not only a merchant marine, but a naval reserve that will be of incalculable benefit to the United States. That is all I care to say on that point.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to submit a few remarks, but I want to first ask a question of the Senator. I ask the Senator why the tenth section of the bill was stricken out yesterday by amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. For the reason that it repealed certain laws relating to tonnage.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that, but why do you want to repeal those laws?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was necessary in the bill as it originally stood, inasmuch as a change was made in the rates of postal-aid law of 1891. The two sections went together, I will say to the Senator, and if one went out the other necessarily had to go out.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not think anybody will accuse the Senator from New Hampshire of unduly pressing this bill. I think those who are opposed to the bill have been rather negligent in debating it. I had prepared myself to debate the eighth section to some extent, but the Senator took that out of the bill yesterday, and consequently I do not desire to be heard upon that question. That is possibly the only thing which I desired to discuss. The bill, of course, is not subject in that respect to the objections that I and others made to it some days since. I did not know much about the tenth section and did not quite understand what it meant.

Though I objected to this bill, I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I will not attempt, so far as I am concerned, to delay a proper consideration of it at any time, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to debate it at any length.

It is a policy, Mr. President, to which I have not been for many years able to give my support. I have not felt, perhaps, the importance of doing the business of the country in American ships that some of our citizens do who live on the Atlantic coast. I live a long way, and the people whom I in part represent live a long way, from the ocean, but if this bill is of value to the people of the United States, or to any section of the country that is so situated that they have a right to expect some special benefits because of their location, I am not against the bill because the section of the country from which I have come has not any interest in it. If it is of interest to the people of New England, the Middle States, or the Atlantic States as a whole, or to the Pacific States, it is of interest to us.

We are exporting pretty large quantities of goods to various parts of the world, and importing, on the other hand, considerable quantities of goods. I think, if I recollect without going into the statistics, that in our export trade we carry about 14 per cent of the whole trade. I may have got the figures reversed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has got it too high. Does he refer to goods carried in American ships?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. In American ships we carry about 9½ per cent of our imports and exports at the present time.

Mr. TELLER. My recollection was that we carried about 14 per cent of our exports and about 7 per cent of our imports.

Mr. GALLINGER. That makes it pretty nearly correct.

Mr. TELLER. But as the exports are greater, of course we carry a little more than an equal division would be.

I suppose the reason American ships do not carry our products is that the foreign ships are willing to carry them for less. Is that not a fact?

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to answer?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; that is what I want—an answer.

Mr. GALLINGER. The reason is that we have not American ships.

Mr. TELLER. We have not American ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have not American ships.

Mr. TELLER. I will ask the Senator why we have not American ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. The reason is that it costs about 35 per cent more to build an American ship than it does to build a foreign ship, and it costs about 25 per cent more to operate it. If the Senator knows any way by which, without aid, Americans can build ships and operate them in competition with Great Britain and Germany, which build their ships cheaper, operate them cheaper, and have subsidies, then I should like to have him explain it.

Mr. TELLER. I believe that is a correct statement. I do not know the exact difference in cost, but I know it is very material, and probably that is a fair statement of the difference in the cost of the building of ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the statement I made is too low.

Mr. TELLER. The inquiry I made was, Why can not we build ships as cheaply in this country as they can be built elsewhere?

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think we can build anything as cheaply in this country as they can in England or Germany or Japan?

Mr. TELLER. Yes; we used to do that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, then, why do we put a tariff duty on foreign products?

Mr. TELLER. On some products I am at a loss to know why we do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but as a whole—as a principle—is it not, I will ask the Senator, because American labor is much better paid than the labor of any other country on earth?

Mr. TELLER. I hope that is true, Mr. President. I believe it is, and I myself believe a tariff properly levied to protect American labor is legitimate. I recollect, years ago when I came into this body—nearly thirty years ago—we wanted not only to protect American labor, but we wanted to protect American capital, which was a good deal scarcer in this country then than it is now, and our rate of interest was much higher than it is at present. I believe that to-day ships could be built here very much cheaper and very much more rapidly if there was a prospect of compensation.

I do not believe the greatest trouble comes from the fact that the ships cost too much, but it comes from the fact that we can not man them so cheaply as other countries do, and because of some burdens that we have put upon the building of ships that are, I think, unnecessary.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Orcutt, the president of the Newport News Ship Building Company, which is one of the largest, if not the largest, employers of men in the shipbuilding industry of this country, testified before the subcommittee of the Merchant Marine Commission that, in his judgment, the difference between the cost of building ships in Great Britain and in the United States was 75 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. The difference in the cost of building?

Mr. MALLORY. The difference in the cost of building was 75 per cent. That was startling to me, because it was largely in excess of what I thought it was. It was in New York that he gave the testimony.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, if the Senator from Florida will permit me, I will ask him, did not Mr. Orcutt qualify that statement afterwards?

Mr. MALLORY. Not that I know of. Other witnesses put it at considerably less; but I do not think anybody put it as low as 35 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I put it low purposely, but I think that some witnesses did put it at 35 per cent, and from that to a much higher degree. Mr. Orcutt at first said it was 75 per cent; but I am very sure, if the Senator will refer to the testimony, he will find that Mr. Orcutt qualified that statement, and said he would not put it at that figure.

Mr. MALLORY. Possibly he did; but that was my recollection. At any rate, I think that from an examination of the testimony on that point, the Senator will come to the conclusion that there is certainly a difference of 50 per cent in the cost, which includes both material and labor.

Mr. TELLER. I can understand why the labor will cost more on a ship built in the United States than it will on a ship built in Europe, but I can not understand, and I do not believe anybody can establish the fact, that the material out of which it is built can not be procured here as cheaply as it can in Europe. We are now sending steel and iron to Europe. Of course, we are selling it at a rate at which the iron and steel manufacturers do not sell it to our people, but if they will put it into ships at a rate as low as they send it to Europe, so far as the material—the iron and steel which enter largely into the building of every ship—is concerned, it can certainly be applied as cheaply. Now, when you come to the lumber that is put in the ships, we can beat them.

It will be remembered that we once carried in American ships eighty-odd per cent of the whole trade of the United States, and it is not so very long ago but that I can remember something about it myself. We could then build wooden ships much cheaper than they could be built in Europe. But a system has grown up of manning foreign ships which perhaps we can not adopt. I do not know that I want to see it adopted. An English ship comes into our harbor, perhaps at San Francisco, with a few Englishmen in it and the rest Asiatics, hired at a price way below that for which any Americal would ship.

There may be some obstacles in the way of building ships here. If we conclude there is, then the only thing for us to do is to determine, first, whether we can build ships without giving a bounty. If we can not, then is it so desirable that our goods shall be carried in American ships that we can afford to pay a bounty for the building of the ships and a bounty for conveying the goods in American ships? That is all there is in this controversy.

I have not reached the point where I believe it would be of sufficient benefit to us to put our wheat and cotton and corn which go abroad in American ships and send them to Europe at an expense to the Government of the United States. We have no assurance whatever that American ships will carry for the producer at any less than the foreign ships. I doubt very much whether, when we have complied with all the provisions of this bill and when we have paid a bounty and when we have secured ships, which we may secure in part, the American producer or the American consumer will be any better off. I doubt whether goods will be carried in American ships as cheaply then as in foreign ships. The tramp ship will outbid us both going and coming, and unless we can change the system of labor upon the European ships that come here, or conclude to change our system by letting Asiatics take the place of American sailors, I do not believe we can compete with Europe in the shipping business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that one great difference is that our statutes require that the officers on American ships shall all be Americans, and they are paid salaries, in many cases, more than twice the salaries of officers on foreign ships. That, of course, can only be cured by the repeal of the law, which I do not believe anybody will advocate.

Mr. TELLER. If I were going to pay a bounty to American ships, I would want them officered by Americans. I do not think there would be any great advantage if the ships were simply owned by American citizens. I suppose one of the great benefits to be derived from a commercial fleet is that in time of war we may call upon a trained class of seamen for naval purposes beyond what we would want to keep up in time of peace.

There is another method which I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts. We might buy a few ships in Europe and bring them over here. Could we not do that? If they can build ships over there cheaper, why can we not go over there and buy ships and have them owned by Americans?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; and we could buy our woolens there and close our woolen mills, just as we are closing our shipyards. They are pretty nearly closed now. The Senator wants to close them entirely.

Mr. TELLER. I have not suggested the closing of any.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would be the result.

Mr. TELLER. I would as lief vote money to keep a mill running as a ship running. There is not very much difference in principle.

It seems to me this question is fairly presented: Would a sufficient benefit accrue to the American people from granting a bounty to these ships? What guaranty have we that they will carry the goods any cheaper than their competitors are now carrying them or than their competitors will then carry them? Will we get any better service than the foreign ships are now giving us?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator, if he wants to interrupt me, that I am not going to make a speech. I rose to make an inquiry.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand this is the best form of debate on a bill of this kind. I will ask the Senator if he listened to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday when he explained the present combination on the part of foreign shipowners?

Mr. TELLER. I listened to the Senator from Massachusetts from beginning to close, and I shall before this debate closes take the RECORD and read it carefully, as I can not always get the idea that is intended to be conveyed, with the confusion in this Chamber and the distance I sit from the speaker. But I was interested enough to listen to the entire speech, and I shall try to read it. I have had no opportunity to do it this morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will ask the Senator if he does not think that competition would be very likely to reduce freight rates? If we are entirely in the hands of foreigners, does the Senator think we are as likely to get cheap freight rates as we would if we had some American competition?

On that point I desire to say to the Senator that the reduction of freight rates on the Great Lakes, where we have competition among our own ships, has been enormous. Probably there is the cheapest carriage on the Lakes that there is in the world; and it has been brought about simply by competition between ships owned by Americans.

Mr. TELLER. In my earlier days I did suppose that additional means of transportation would bring about competition. I am not so entirely sure of that in these days of combinations and trusts. It is possible there might be the same condition in connection with transportation by sea that we have in connection with transportation by land. I know there has been a tremendous reduction in transportation by railroads, and in some instances these combinations have been necessary to the existence of the corporations. They have perhaps been beneficial to some communities. I remember that forty years or more ago the fares on the railroads were very high. They opened the railroads in my country in the seventies, somewhere along there—1872 or 1873—and we paid 10 cents a mile from Omaha to Cheyenne, a distance of 500-odd miles. We paid $50 apiece. I suppose one can ride now that distance for $10. I think that is the fare; I do not remember.

If conditions are normal, more ships probably ought to bring lower freights, although I am told by those who pretend to know that the rates now are so low that really there is not any encouragement to hope to get any lower rates. Whether that is true or not I do not know. There are some advantages which would probably grow out of this bill, if it passed; that is to say, if the ships were built. If no ships were built, I suppose no harm would come; but if the ships were built, they would be built by American mechanics.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust the Senate may be in order. I know that other Senators, as well as I, would like to hear the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the ships will be built in Atlantic shipyards mostly. Some might be built on the Pacific coast, but they will be built mostly in the Atlantic shipyards, and largely in what are called the New England and Middle States. But the question is, Will the whole country get the advantage and benefit of this bounty?

I do not know but that the United States Government might under certain circumstances be justified in encouraging shipping by a bounty, but I do not know just the best way to do it. I have thought for a good many years that the idea often presented here would be the best—that is, to give to the men who brought the goods in American ships a reduction of the duty on the goods.

I confess I was somewhat startled when I read this bill, which I understood was for the purpose of encouraging American shipping, to see the eighth section in it, and I intended to express my opinion on it. I do not quite understand how a commission organized for the purpose of securing the building of American ships should add any incumbrance, I may say. The bill is more logical and to me is more agreeable when it does not put a duty upon American ships according to tonnage or anything else. I would give by law, if I could, to American ships all the encouragement possible without giving what I think is an undesirable thing—a bounty.

Of course, we have gone into the bounty business to such an extent that nobody need stand here and object to a bill on the ground that it provides a bounty, because I have found myself that if the bounty is acceptable and is to be received by a certain section of the country, that section is for it and it ceases to be a question of policy and becomes one of interest immediately. I remember when we were paying a bounty to a foreign people. It was only a very short time ago. We were supposed to be making a present of about nine or ten million dollars a year to the sugar growers of Cuba. I remember that a question arose as to our right to do that. Legally I do not suppose there was any question. We had a right to reduce the duty on sugar coming from Cuba. It was to my mind simply a question of policy. But that is the only case I remember where we paid a bounty to foreign competitors. In that case, as it turned out, I believe an American concern succeeded in securing the bounty, and the sugar growers in Cuba were left to do the best they could. As they were doing very well at that time, they did not need our assistance, and they have been growing and increasing the quantity of their product ever since.

Mr. President, I did not get up to make a speech. I wanted to get some idea from the advocates of this bill as to these questions; and I should like to say to the Senator who has this bill in charge that if he wants to assist the passage of the bill I think the best way will be to convince us that some good will come to the community at large, not only to the men who want to own ships, but to the people who use ships, and that the people in the great West, who are to-day furnishing the bulk of American exports, will get a cheaper rate on their exports than they are now getting. Some day later I propose to take up this question and show that the great bulk of the exports of the United States come from what you call the "West."

This is a matter that especially interests New England, as I understand, and I want to disclaim any hostility to New England, whether it be the great big State of Massachusetts or the smaller States. They have the same interest to me that any other section of the country has, and I am not going to vote against this bill because the people of Colorado will not own any ships. But if I do vote for it at all, I shall be very much better pleased if I feel that the shippers of products in my State will derive some immediate benefit—not the benefit they would derive from the prosperity of one section and which ought to reach all sections to some extent, but some special benefit—for I have found by my experience here that about the highest order of statesmanship we have had of late years is that each section of the country must look out for itself, and the others take care of themselves as best they may.

We have had a little bit of unpleasant history and unpleasant relation in the West with that idea which has prevailed, I think, to a very alarming extent of late. If the Senator will convince me that the whole country—not one section alone, but the whole country—will be benefited—not the men who build the ships, but the men, as I repeat, who use the ships—and they are the people I am interested in; they are the people in whom we all ought to be interested—I think, perhaps, I shall be able to find some constitutional right to vote this money out of the Treasury. But until that is done, I am not disposed to.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I should like to advert to a feature presented by the bill as it now stands which, in my judgment, is an anomaly in the way of legislation. Provision is made here for the payment of sums of money amounting to several million dollars, more than $2,000,000 per annum, I think, and there is no provision that I have been able to find since the elimination of section 8 for the payment of that money out of the Treasury or in any other way.

I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if there is anywhere in the bill a provision for the payment of these bounties to ships and the bounty to the naval volunteers since the eighth section has been stricken out?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is just as much provision in the bill for the payment of it as there ever was in a shipping bill. It is true that by eliminating that section a certain amount will be kept from entering the Treasury unless the section be restored in another place, but I suppose there will be no difficulty about getting the money out of the Treasury of the United States if the bill should pass.

Mr. MALLORY. Suppose the bill passes the Senate and goes to the House of Representatives and the House passes it in the shape in which it is. Does the Senator mean that a dollar could be collected and paid to the shipowners or the naval reserve men as the bill is now?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not any doubt of it.

Mr. MALLORY. Where is there any appropriation made in the bill? The Treasury can not pay out money unless it is appropriated by Congress. I do not see any appropriating clause here at all to take the place of section 8.

Mr. GALLINGER. Section 8 did not appropriate any money.

Mr. TELLER. I understand it was to earn the money——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. If this bill should pass both Houses, it would be a law, and the Appropriations Committee undoubtedly would make the necessary appropriations to carry out the provisions of the law.

Mr. MALLORY. It would depend upon the subsequent action of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. FRYE. Undoubtedly. I do not think in any shipping bill which has passed the Senate heretofore there has been an express provision appropriating the money from the Treasury for the payment of subsidies and bounties.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not remember whether there has been or not.

Mr. FRYE. I do not think there has been. I do not remember any.

Mr. MALLORY. I merely wanted to call attention to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was there a direct appropriation in the act of 1891, known as the "postal-subsidy act?"

Mr. MALLORY. I do not remember whether there was or not.

Mr. FRYE. There was not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet the money has been paid out.

Mr. MALLORY. It struck me if the bill should pass there would be no provision for paying this money.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the eighth section was supposed to raise the money to be used; but, of course, it was to go into the Treasury, and there would have to be an appropriation made under any circumstances, even if the eighth section had remained in.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. There was no provision for paying out the money; and it must go into the Treasury.

Mr. GALLINGER. The additional tonnage tax would not have met some of the obligations of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Not the whole obligation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Only in part.

Mr. TELLER. It would depend upon how many ships were put afloat.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly. I mean if the lines had been established it would not have met all the obligations of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. That is the reason why I said the bill was more logical with the amendment than without it, because I thought it was rather a remarkable proposition that in order to secure more ships we should tax the ships more than we had been taxing them.

Mr. GALLINGER. We tax foreign ships under that provision much more than we tax American ships. If the Senator will refer to another section of the bill, he will discover that there is a rebate of 80 per cent to American ships if they will carry boys, following the precedent adopted by Great Britain, which is a very wise nation in this matter. So the burden to American ships has not been increased.

Mr. TELLER. I will say frankly that my attention has not been called to that provision of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is such a provision.

Mr. President, I was somewhat surprised that the Senator from Colorado should raise, even by suggestion, the sectional question in reference to this bill. Commencing a great many years ago in another body, I voted for every proposition that came before that body which was intended to benefit the great West, and I have continued consistently to do that during my public life. I took occasion to make some observations on the irrigation bill, in favor of it, and I voted for it, although my people had no interest, and New England had no interest in it; Pennsylvania or New York, so far as I know, had no interest in it, and yet it was a pleasure for me to vote for that bill, and I would vote for any similar bill that might come before this body.

The Senator says New England is going to benefit largely and almost exclusively by this legislation.

Mr. TELLER. I said it would benefit directly from the building of ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is mistaken on that point. If the Senator had gone to the record, he would have found that New England to-day has only two or three shipbuilding concerns, and they are not in a very prosperous condition. I think they are on the verge of bankruptcy, if one or more of them have not gone into bankruptcy in recent years. If the Senator will go to New York, he will find at least two great shipbuilding concerns there. They have had a bad time of it in recent years. They have had to reorganize, and do all sorts of things to live. Then, if he will go to Philadelphia, he will find two shipbuilding establishments. If he will go to Virginia, he will find one. If he will go to Florida, I think he will find that they are building some ships there. I do not know that there is a shipyard of much consequence, but they are building some ships in Florida. If he will go to Puget Sound, he will find a great shipbuilding concern. He will find another in San Francisco.

So the Senator's suggestion that this is intended to benefit New England, so far as shipbuilding is concerned, is not correct. I, as a member of the Merchant Marine Commission, certainly eliminated from my mind every possible thought that the proposed legislation was going to benefit my section of the country; and I think if the Senator will go through the testimony he will find that we tried to keep that out of view. And so I think the Senator, upon a review of the situation, will see that we are not advocating this measure because we chance to come from New England or because it is in the interest of our own people.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. If I made a statement that could be tortured into that, I was unfortunate in my language. I said I could not see any immediate benefit to the producers of the country, although it might be beneficial to New England, and I even included the Atlantic shipyards.

If the Senator will allow me, I want to say that I realize what the Senator said about his treatment of the West. I wish to bear testimony that of all the Senators from New England nobody has been more kind to the West than the Senator from New Hampshire, and I appreciate it. I wish to add that I do not believe any New England Senator can ever show a vote of mine in the Senate or a word spoken that would indicate that I had less interest in New England than I have in the great West. I am myself at least a half New Englander. My mother was a Vermont woman. My grandfather was a Massachusetts man. I was born in New York. I was brought up in the East. I have none of the prejudices some people have against the East. I have sometimes lamented that the East did not understand the West, and I have sometimes felt that injustice was being done us, not because it was intended to do injustice, but because the people did not understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. That indictment will not lie against the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TELLER. No; it will not lie against the Senator from New Hampshire, and it will not lie, I am free to say, against very many Senators from any section. But some years ago I used to feel frequently that the West was entirely misunderstood.

Colorado is in the center of the continent. I do not know how many New England people we have there, but I know we have thousands and thousands of them. I know that we have been sending to this body and to the East as our representatives men who were born in the East and not born in the West. We have manned our colleges and our schools with New England teachers and Middle-State teachers. We have put eastern men in high places in the State, and it would be remarkable if I should attempt to cast my imputation upon the New England people, for whom I have the greatest respect. I only meant to say that I could see some benefit to some section, and I wanted to see a benefit to all sections. That is all I meant to say, and I hope the Senator will understand that I meant no imputation upon him or any other New England Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not misunderstand the Senator, I think. On that point, however, let me make a further suggestion. I may be old fashioned and I may be wrong in my notions about this thing, but I have held to the view all through my public life that whatever benefited one section of this country benefited the whole country.

Mr. TELLER. I agree to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I said to my people when I was somewhat criticised for supporting the irrigation bill, with the ardor with which I supported it, that if we redeemed the arid and semiarid land of the great West and by that means it became populated, if families went on the land and established homes, every factory in New England would derive a benefit from it, and it would help New England just as much as it would Colorado or any other section of the country.

That is my view in regard to this matter. I believe if we reestablish the great industry of shipbuilding it will be a benefit to the entire country. It will give employment to skilled American mechanics. It will give employment to sailors. It will open our shipyards to some extent, and I have no doubt that Colorado and every other western State will feel the influence of that revival of a great American industry and will benefit by it. I can not of course say to the Senator precisely what benefit Colorado or any other State in the great West will receive, but I believe there will be a reflex action that all the great States of the West and Northwest will feel and will benefit by it.

I do not attribute to the Senator from Colorado the intention of raising a sectional question at all in this regard, but at the same time I wanted to correct the impression the Senator seemed to have that New England is dotted with shipyards. The fact is, we have a languishing industry in Bath, in the State that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce so ably represents. We have a shipyard in Quincy, Mass., although it has not much work, and I think there is a shed of some description in New London, Conn., where those two great steamships which Mr. Hill had built were constructed. But it is not an established shipyard. I can not recall any other shipyard in New England. There may be one, but I do not recall it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator thought I was making an attack upon any section. I certainly did not intend to do so. It is true we have now what is called the "reclamation system." The Government has appropriated about $30,000,000 of public money, every dollar of which came from the settlers of the West. Not a dollar has been paid by New England or any other portion of the country. I might call attention now, and I will not do so by way of complaint, to the fact that in 1837 the Government of the United States divided among the States a sum nearly equal to the sum that has now been appropriated for reclamation purposes. Twenty-eight million dollars was divided. There were about six or seven hundred thousand dollars which at that time went west of the Mississippi River to Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri. Not a dollar of that money has ever been paid back. I suppose it never will be paid back. I confess now if there was a proposition to compel the States to pay it back I would not be in favor of doing it. It has passed and gone.

Mr. SPOONER. It was a surplus.

Mr. TELLER. There was a surplus in the Treasury amounting to about thirty-three or thirty-four million dollars. This was a surplus derived from the sale of public lands in the public-land States, and the Government divided it with the States according to their population. Massachusetts, having the largest population in New England, got the largest amount of money in New England. New York being the largest in population got the largest amount, and Pennsylvania came next. They gave a certificate payable whenever the Government called for the money, and the matter has rested from that time, and it will rest, as far as I am concerned, for all time.

Now, Mr. President, this is the first time I ever mentioned the subject in the Senate. I only mention it now to say that, knowing that fact, I have sometimes felt that when there was complaint made, especially when it was made about the reclamation business, we had the right to some of this money as well as the East, and it was hardly fair. I am sorry to hear that the shipping business has been in such bad shape in New England——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in very bad shape.

Mr. TELLER. And that the industry has languished as it has done. I am very much afraid, Mr. President, that this bill will not revive it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not any worse in New England, I will say to the Senator, than in all other parts of the country.

Mr. TELLER. Well, I do not know that that is so; probably not.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Now, Mr. President, I am interested in what the Senator has said about the surplus money that was distributed to the States. I have a historical knowledge of the fact, but I do not care to go into the discussion of it. The Senator says that $30,000,000 have been thus far put into the reclamation fund. Of course the Senator knows it will be $60,000,000 or, possibly, $100,000,000 before we get through with it.

Mr. TELLER. I hope so.

Mr. GALLINGER. But that does not make any difference. I do not care if it is $200,000,000. If it will open up those great States to settlement, it will be an investment that no patriotic American ought to regret. I certainly never shall regret it, whatever it is.

Mr. President, I had not intended to occupy any time to-day, but perhaps I might as well now as at any time. There are a few Senators present and probably there will be fewer before I get through, but I have some observations to make in answer to the very elaborate speech of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], and I might as well occupy the floor now as at any other time.

First, Mr. President, in reference to the striking out of the section relating to the American Line, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] yesterday suggested that that would put those four great American ships under the British flag, in his judgment, and I assented to it. I hope it will not come immediately, but unless we give some assistance to that line I am satisfied that is going to be the outcome, and we will not have a merchant steamship on the North Atlantic in the near future. But there were overwhelming reasons why we thought it best to strike that provision from the bill, which I will not now stop to explain. It is possible that the Senator from Maine will speak of this further. He is always diligent, and he knows much more about these questions than I will ever pretend to know, and he himself ought to have been at the head of the Merchant Marine Commission to have conducted this inquiry; but I was drafted into the service and I did the best I could, with a very inadequate equipment.

The Merchant Marine Commission did not forget to take note of the North Atlantic situation. We were confronted by a great problem, the problem that the British Government were not only subsidizing their ships, but were actually putting up the money to construct the ships, and that if we went into competition with Great Britain on the North Atlantic it would take an immense amount of money out of the public Treasury to make it a success. The Commission in their report said this:

> Moreover, the enormous new Cunard subvention of $1,000,000 for twenty years, combined with the extraordinary liberality of the British Government in loaning to the company at a nominal rate the $13,000,000 required to build the new ships, introduces another factor that forbids an immediate recommendation to Congress. It is estimated that with the other generous terms of the contract this subvention is worth to the Cunard Line the equivalent of $2,000,000 or $2,500,000 a year, which would have to be more than offset in amount to produce a corresponding American ocean mail service, covering the higher range of American ship wages and cost of construction. Manifestly the American people, whatever their final decision may be, would hesitate to embark on such a scale of expenditure as this while the imperative technical question of whether the turbine is to supplant reciprocating engines as the screw propeller supplanted the side wheel is still undetermined.
> Therefore, the Commission, though fully realizing the commercial and political importance of the fast North Atlantic mail service and the value of these great "merchant cruisers" to the national defense, is unwilling at this time to recommend any specific legislation to Congress. But the Commission does insist with the utmost earnestness that the United States can not afford to disregard the mighty transition that seems to be impending in the North Atlantic; a change which, if ignored by our Government, may result in the complete loss of even our present inadequate share of the noblest field of ocean navigation.
> Congress owes it to the commercial welfare and the naval security of the country to make provision at once for an especial, vigilant study of the North Atlantic steamship service, as affected not only by the extraordinary new British subventions, but by the approaching introduction of the turbine high-speed engines on the all-important mail and passenger routes between America and Europe.

Mr. President, that is a mere recommendation; it carries no weight unless Congress takes cognizance of it; but it shows that the Commission in its investigation did not entirely lose sight of the fact that we are soon to be absolutely wiped off the North Atlantic Ocean. Having only one line now, with four great ships, which are being operated at a loss, the probability is after their present contract is concluded with the Government, or very likely before it is concluded by the surrender of the amount of money that they were bonded to pay in the event of terminating it, we will have no American steamship on the North Atlantic route.

I wish it were otherwise. I wish that we could here and now feel—I wish I could personally feel—like asking the Congress of the United States, this great rich nation of ours, to do something to put the American flag on that great highway of travel. But the Commission did not feel that they were justified to do it, and they have undertaken to do smaller things than that, which I hope will not entirely fail.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if Admiral Dewey in very earnest words has not declared that fast ships like the four liners which now carry the American flag are an absolute necessity to this Government in case of war?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not only Admiral Dewey, but the Army Board as well.

Mr. FRYE. No ship in case of war is worth anything as a scout that will not make 20 knots an hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. FRYE. Those four ships are the only ships we have that will make that speed, and while the Commission talks nicely about the North Atlantic and swift ships and all that sort of thing it gives us for our food nothing but persimmons.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that may be so; but as the Senator from Maine is chairman of the great Committee on Commerce of this body he has the benefit of the investigations, whether they were for good or bad, that the Commission made; and the Senator can to-morrow introduce a bill for a subvention to steamships on the North Atlantic, if he sees proper to do so. I will support it. I do not know whether the Senator from Florida would or not.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. If that is so deserving, why not put it in this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. There was a small provision in the bill giving a little additional subvention to these ships, and the most earnest protestations came from the other side of the Chamber against it, and it was taken out.

Mr. SPOONER. Was it taken out because it was so small? Is that the reason?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know about that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I must yield to the Senator from Nevada. He is always entertaining.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Did I understand the Senator to say that England was not only granting subsidies to the steamship companies, but was also aiding in the construction of ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator did understand me aright. England has put up $13,000,000 to build two new steamships for the Cunard Line at a rate of interest at 2¾ per cent, and has given a subvention of $1,100,000 a year to them, it being understood that they will pay for the cost of the ships through that subvention.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Are we to understand that England builds those ships and then turns them over to a private company, or does England retain the ownership of the ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. England does not retain any ownership. She pays the money into the Cunard Steamship Company's coffers. That is what we are, as the boys would say, "up against" on the North Atlantic, and we are "up against" some serious propositions elsewhere in this country.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Would the Senator advocate any such action on the part of the Congress of the United States in regard to any line on the North Atlantic that the British Government is pursuing toward the Cunarders?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is useless to ask that question. The Senator from New Hampshire has not suggested it in the report he made to Congress.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from New Hampshire, I know, does not suggest it. The Senator from New Hampshire has, I think, desired to accomplish many more things than are set forth in the bill. I should like to know whether the Senator would approve of such a donation as that to any line.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, we will cross the bridge when we come to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit another question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GALLINGER. Always.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand it is the purpose of the subsidy to enable the shipbuilders to construct a number of vessels that will be useful to our Navy in case of war, not as scouts, but in other capacities.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, would it not be possible, if those ships are ultimately to be used by the Navy, for the Government to construct such ships, letting them out temporarily upon a remunerative basis to the shipowners?

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, the Senator is enlarging his vision. He is going to have the Government incorporate, and, I believe, run all the railroads of the country. Now he is going to take in the ships. Where is the Senator going to stop?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know where we will stop in this matter of subsidies. All I can say, generally speaking, is, if the Government is to advance anything toward private enterprise, I should prefer that the Government should own the things constructed, rather than let somebody else own them, if it pays the money. I was simply inquiring of the Senator in entire good faith whether we could not in enlarging our Navy provide vessels which could be used in case of emergency, in case of war, and which could be temporarily used in the commerce of the country, and thus advance the end which the Senator has in view.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, this is, as Kipling would say, another story. The Senator can introduce a bill of that kind. If it comes to the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Commerce, of which I chance to be a member, I will look at it. I do not think it is feasible.

Now, Mr. President, in reference to certain points made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], I wish to make a reply as briefly as possible.

The Senator from Florida contended that the proposed subvention of $5 per gross ton per year was insufficient to secure any ships for the cargo-carrying trade of the country, and the Senator read a letter from a citizen of his State showing that he owned a schooner by the name of John Francis, of 330 tons, and a Norwegian steamer of 1,200 tons, which the Senator said he could not put in the American trade under this subvention at a profit. The Senator from Florida, who is very much better versed in maritime matters than I am, knows that those are two extreme examples. The Senator knows there are very few such schooners and such ships to-day—I mean as small as those are—in the foreign trade at all, and I do not think that we are bidding exactly for that class of ships.

But, Mr. President, the men who build ships, or who will build them if we give them a chance in this country, say that they will construct ships under the provisions of this bill, if we give them an opportunity. Schooner owners of large experience, among them Mr. Fields S. Pendleton, whom the Senator from Florida knows well, president of the Atlantic Carriers' Association, managing a great many vessels, says that this subvention, with close economy—and that is always emphasized by the shipowners—will enable them to do what we hope it will do, and that the $5 per ton rate will be sufficient to equalize conditions as between American and foreign vessels.

I have here, Mr. President, a comparison between two ships, a very accurate comparison, the American steamship Pleiades and the Norwegian steamship Olaff Kyrie. They are of the same tonnage. It appears from statistics, which have been very carefully compiled, that the American ship will pay in wages $1,215, while the Norwegian ship will pay $712 a month.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator state what coast of the United States that trade is on?

Mr. GALLINGER. They are in the Pacific trade.

Mr. MALLORY. Is not the Norwegian vessel carrying Chinese sailors?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think very likely it is, but that does not change the point I am now going to make.

Mr. PERKINS. The Pleiades is running in the Pacific coast trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; on the Pacific. The wages on the American ship is $1,215 a month, or $14,580 a year; on the Norwegian ship $712 a month, or $8,544 a year, the annual difference in favor of the foreigner being $6,036 a year. This comparison is made, I will say, with white crews on both ships.

Now, we will make a comparison of the charges based on the cost of construction. The first cost of the American ship was $275,000; of the Norwegian ship $214,000. The interest at 5 per cent and the depreciation at 5 per cent and insurance at 6 per cent makes the total cost of the American ship $44,000, and of the Norwegian $34,240. The annual difference in these items is thus $9,760.

The cost of food is $4,745 on the American and $2,847 on the Norwegian, making a difference of $1,898.

Now, adding together the difference in annual wages, the difference in charges based on cost of construction, and the difference in the cost of food, there is a total of $17,649, as between an American steamer like the Pleiades, of the tramp type, and a similar Norwegian steamer.

The Pleiades, of 3,753 gross tons, would receive in subventions annually, on the basis of $5 per ton, the sum of $18,765, thus amply equalizing conditions between this typical American freighter and a Norwegian freighter of like class.

But, Mr. President, I go somewhat further than that. I addressed some letters to distinguished shipbuilders and shipowners, asking whether they would construct ships under the terms of this bill. The Boston Tow-Boat Company, of which the Senator from Florida well knows, replies as follows:

BOSTON TOW-BOAT COMPANY,
Boston, January 19, 1906.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Merchant Marine Commission,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 18th, as to whether the subvention of $5 per ton to cargo vessels in general foreign trade and $6.50 per ton in Philippine trade is sufficient to cover the difference in cost of operation between American and foreign vessels, I would say that I regard this as sufficient, provided the American ships are managed economically and proper efforts are made to secure full cargoes.

The Boston Tow Boat Company has three American-built steel steamships of the general-cargo type—the Lyra, Hyades, and Pleiades—running out of Puget Sound to China, Japan, and the Philippines. These vessels, of about 5,000 tons capacity, have Americans as the officers and leading men and Asiatics as the remainder of their crews. I believe that your proposed subvention of $5 per ton for general and oriental and $6.50 for Philippine trade will enable our company to operate these ships successfully against the competition of similar foreign vessels, though the bill compels us to increase the proportion of Americans, and, therefore, the rate of wages and cost of maintenance in our crews. This statement applies to the Pacific trade, in which these vessels are now engaged, with two 12,000-ton ships belonging to the Boston Steamship Company.

These subventions to general cargo vessels are in general sufficient to encourage the building and operation of American steamships with large capacity for grain, flour, lumber, cotton, provisions, and general merchandise.

I will pause just there to say that the Commission, I think, exercising some degree of wisdom, has constructed this bill largely along those lines, so that the ships will carry the heavier cargoes or the grosser cargoes, such as Mr. Winsor alludes to here:

But in my judgment the subventions are not enough to encourage the building of fast passenger steamships for the trade from North Atlantic ports to Europe. However, as I understand the bill and report of the Commission, it is your purpose to build up American shipping in the trade with Asia, South America, etc. Here the subventions you suggest will unquestionably be sufficient.

Very truly, yours,

ALFRED WINSOR, President.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. The closing sentence of that letter relates entirely to the operating expenses—believed to be sufficient to meet the difference in operating expenses.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Winsor has not figured on the difference in the original cost of the ship.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, I think so. He says he will build ships.

Mr. MALLORY. I think the Senator will find in reading the letter over again that he contemplated whether this $5 a ton was sufficient to pay the difference between the operating expenses of the two.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not. Mr. Winsor has assured me personally that if this bill ever becomes a law he will build additional ships for his trade.

Mr. MALLORY. I doubt it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Arthur Sewall & Co., of Bath, Me., who build largely sailing vessels, have written a long letter saying that if this bill becomes a law they will build more ships and do something for the American merchant marine. I will not stop to read the letter, which is a long one.

BATH, ME., January 20, 1906.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your valued favor of 19th instant, I beg to state that my firm is operating a fleet of large steel square-rigged sail ships, which we built in our own shipyard in this city. For some years, in fact since the subsidized French sailing ships have appeared on the ocean in numbers, we have been unable to operate our ships in the foreign trade and have only managed to exist by engaging in the transportation of sugars from Hawaii, a trade protected by our coastwise laws, sending our ships out to the Pacific with coal, and, failing to get that, with oil to a foreign port at best rate obtainable, but frequently a rate insufficient to pay the actual operating expenses of the ship—in fact, getting out as best we could in order to get a freight home on Hawaiian sugar. The profits for such a round voyage, owing to the low outward rates in competition with foreign vessels, have been so meager that we have been forced to suspend the building of such vessels, and our shipbuilding plant, which for many years gave employment to hundreds of skilled mechanics, has laid idle during the past three years. It produces now only a flourishing crop of weeds.

After January, 1907, we shall lose the Hawaiian sugar transportation, owing to a contract which has been made for a series of years for the transportation of the crop by the American-Hawaiian Steamship line, operating in conjunction with the Tehuantepec Railroad Company, of Mexico, the sugar being taken from Hawaii by steamer to the Pacific terminus of the railroad, shipped across Mexico by this Mexican railroad, which has been developed and is owned by British capital, and then, again, at the Atlantic terminus turned over to the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company and by the steamers carried to Philadelphia and New York. Thus a transportation company, one link of which is a railroad on foreign soil, is enabled to drive out of our protected (?) coastwise trade the vessels which the coastwise laws were intended to protect.

When this trade is lost to us we know of no other in which it is possible to operate our ships without absolute loss, and, unless Congress concludes to give the shipbuilding and shipowning industry a moderate share of the protection, which has been extended to all other American industries, and which has been the declared policy of the dominant party for years, our ships will be unable to sail the ocean, and will doubtless become in the near future coal barges or coal hulks at a ruinous sacrifice to their owners and, I believe also, at some considerable loss to our merchant marine and Navy, and consequently to the nation.

The one ray of hope we have is in the passage by Congress of the bill formulated by the Merchant Marine Commission and now under your most able charge in the Senate, and the provisions of that bill will both enable us to operate our present ships and, in conjunction with the act of April, 1904, governing the transportation of supplies for the Army and Navy, encourage us to reopen our shipyard. It will mean just the difference between a living and growing industry and hopeless decay.

Very respectfully, yours, SAML. S. SEWALL.

The Atlantic Carriers' Association writes a similar letter, which I will put in the RECORD.

ATLANTIC CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York, January 21, 1906.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Merchant Marine Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to the inquiry contained in your letter of the 19th, as to whether or not the provision of $5 per gross ton per year, or $6.50 per ton in the Philippine trade for cargo vessels, in the shipping bill prepared by your Commission, is sufficient to encourage American shipowners to engage in the foreign trade and increase their tonnage of this useful description, permit me to say: The amount provided will not entirely meet the difference against American sail vessels of the medium size, as in competition with Nova Scotia vessels in the West Indian, Central and South American, and African trade, but it will come so nearly to meeting it as to justify the belief that, with the strictest economy enforced in the operation of our vessels, we shall be able to eventually entirely supersede such vessels in a trade from which they have well-nigh driven American sailing vessels. This is a trade that my vessels are largely engaged in, and if the bill passes as drawn I expect, myself, to build eight or ten vessels in the next five years.

I hear other members of our association saying that they too will build, if the bill passes as drawn, and I have no doubt that its passage will lead to a general revival of wooden shipbuilding, not alone in the New England, but in the South Atlantic and Gulf ports of the United States, where proximity of materials, salubrity of climate, and labor conditions make it attractive as a section in which to establish wooden shipbuilding plants.

Should there be any reduction in the amount to be paid to cargo vessels from that provided in the bill as drawn originally, I am sure the difference against American vessels would make it unattractive for present owners to increase their tonnage. Again, if the bill should discriminate against any class of American vessels engaging in the foreign trade because of their tonnage it would lead to widespread dissatisfaction with, and possibly indifference regarding, the fate of the bill.

Permit me to utilize the occasion to compliment you, and through you the other distinguished members of your honorable Commission, upon the very excellent, although extremely moderate, measure that you have drafted. If it should be passed by Congress as drawn, myself and associates in the Atlantic Carriers' Association are convinced that it will inaugurate an American maritime policy that will eventually give us a great American mercantile marine, alike creditable to the nation and helpful to it in the extension of its commerce and as an auxiliary aid to the Navy.

I have the honor to remain, with best wishes for the success of the bill.

Yours, very truly, FIELDS S. PENDLETON.

The Lewis Luckenbach Transportation, Coast Towing, and Wrecking Steamship Company writes a similar letter, as follows:

NEW YORK, January 19, 1906.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Merchant Marine Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 18th relative to proposed subvention, beg to state that I think we can compete with foreigners at $5 per gross ton per year and $6.50 per ton to the Philippines.

I certainly hope the bill will go through and become a law. A practical demonstration will prove whether or not we can compete with the foreigners at these figures.

Thanking you for your efforts on behalf of the American shipping, I am,

Yours, truly, LEWIS LUCKENBACH.

The Red "D" Line of Steamships, Boulton, Bliss & Dallett, general managers, 82 Wall street, New York, December 5, 1904, say:

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman the Merchant Marine Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your communication asking my opinion regarding the proposed rates of compensation for the lines of steamers to South America, and in reply beg to say that, while I am not very familiar with the trade of Brazil and the Argentine, it seems to me that the proposed rates are liberal enough to induce responsible bidders to submit proposals.

Very respectfully, yours, ERNEST C. BLISS.

I will say that Mr. Bliss is one of the managers of the American Red "D" Line from New York to Venezuela—the only American steam line to South America beyond the Isthmus of Panama. Venezuela is one of the two South American countries in whose import trade the United States stands first—the other country being Colombia, which is connected at Colon and Panama, now in the Panama Republic, with this country by direct lines of American steamers. The only two South American countries where we have very much trade are those two countries where we have existing lines.

The New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company say that they will, under the terms of this bill, be able to operate their ships. Their letter is as follows:

NEW YORK AND CUBA MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY,
New York, December 5, 1904.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Merchant Marine Commission, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In the absence of Mr. Alfred G. Smith, who is at present in Cuba, and to whom your letter of December 1 was addressed, would say that I have perused same very carefully and am of the opinion that the amounts of compensation as therein submitted are adequate to assure proposals from responsible bidders.

Yours, very truly,

HENRY P. BOOTH, President.

Mr. Booth is the head of the Ward Line of United States mail steamers to Cuba and Mexico. The New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company has the largest number of American steamships in foreign trade of all the companies on the Atlantic seaboard and has the greatest interests in West India and Mexican commerce.

The United Fruit Company give similar testimony:

UNITED FRUIT COMPANY, NEW ORLEANS DIVISION,
New Orleans, La., December 3, 1904.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Merchant Marine Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 1st instant, respecting the schedule of new ocean mail service proposed for four new lines from Gulf ports, based on an advance in the rates of the present postal subsidy law, would say that, assuming that the vessels engaged in the service mentioned would only have to touch at one port in each of the countries named, I consider the figures given in your letter sufficiently attractive to secure proposals from responsible bidders. I should be glad to hear from you further on the subject as it progresses.

Sincerely, yours,

C. H. ELLIS, Manager.

Mr. Ellis is the representative at New Orleans of the United Fruit Company, operating many foreign vessels, chiefly chartered, in trade with the West Indies and Central America.

A. H. Bull & Co., ship brokers and steamship agents, have written a letter showing that they regard the subvention as sufficient for the contemplated purposes. It is as follows:

NEW YORK, January 30, 1906.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Chairman the Merchant Marine Commission,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your favor of January 18 received. We beg to apologize for not answering it more promptly.

Our steamers carry from 2,700 to 3,100 tons of cargo, which is about the average size of vessels carrying coal to West India ports. Take, for example, our steamship Mac. During the past year rates to Habana have averaged about $1.45, and at this rate we have, of course, been unable to compete. If we were to receive the subvention of $2.50 per ton for six months in the foreign trade, this would enable us to take coal, say, to Habana and bring back cargoes from the Gulf ports to ports north of Hatteras. Allowing eleven trips a year on cargoes of 2,700 tons each, would give us 20 cents a ton on our down cargoes. This would hardly be sufficient for us to compete successfully with this sized steamer, as under present conditions we have figured we could not take coal to Habana at less than $1.75. If we were able to secure back cargoes of sugar for part of the time, so as she could come under the $4 subvention, we could possibly make it pay, provided the rates on sugar were not lower than 8½ cents a hundred, which has been a fair average the last two years. We hardly think that it would pay for the $5 subvention to keep steamers of this size in the foreign trade all the time.

From our study of your bill we think it very questionable whether it would give much encouragement to steamers of from 2,000 to 3,500 tons adapted to coastwise business to enter the foreign trade. However, it surely would build vessels of from 4,000 to 5,000 tons, as they, with the subvention, would be nearer an equal footing with foreign boats. Steamers carrying 2,000 to 3,500 tons dead weight require within a man or two the same number of crew as a steamer of 4,000 or 5,000 tons. The operating expenses, too, are very much less per ton on the larger boat. We think if steamers of 2,000 to 3,500 tons were given a little higher subvention, it would encourage the building of more vessels of that size, for the bill as it stands will hardly put them on parity with other foreign competitors. Unquestionably a boat of 2,000 to 3,500 tons is the most useful pioneer to open a new trade, and it is only when three or four of these smaller boats have shown the ability to get cargoes that a 5,000 to 6,000 ton steamer can be employed.

Then, too, from a naval standpoint, two vessels of 2,000 to 3,500 tons capacity will require fully 30 to 40 per cent more men than one steamer of five to six thousand tons. Both classes are needed to make up a useful and adequate merchant marine, and both require Federal assistance to enter the foreign trade. While we think your bill, as it stands, is about sufficient for a vessel of 5,000 tons or larger, it is not quite sufficient to encourage the building of smaller steamers. However, we appreciate that the freight rates in the foreign trade have averaged lower in the last three years than was really profitable to foreign owners, so that perhaps it is not fair to take this average as an equitable rate for future years.

Another point which should be guarded against is in case a steamer can not procure boys. Upon the indorsement of this fact by some proper authority it would excuse the vessel from taking them on that particular voyage; otherwise we think any owner would be subject to being held up at the last moment for lack of apprentices.

We are anxious to see your bill become a law, as we consider it by far the fairest and most equitable legislation that has been proposed. While we doubt whether we would put the steamers we have at present in the foreign trade, we would unquestionably build tonnage of from five to six thousand tons should your proposed bill become a law.

Yours, very respectfully,

A. H. BULL & CO.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is testimony which we can not very well wink out of sight, and that it shows that the Commission has not been recommending legislation which will be inoperative should it be enacted into law.

If I remember correctly, the Senator from Florida objected that the tramp steamers receiving a subvention could not get cargoes. I think I am correct in that. To this it may be said that our present American ships convey only about 10 per cent of our foreign commerce. A reasonable proportion of the 90 per cent now conveyed by foreign ships would furnish cargoes for a fleet many times larger than our present one.

The Senator from Georgia has also asked why under the terms of section 2 slow vessels receive the same rate of subvention of $5 per gross ton per year as fast steamers.

This subvention of $5 per gross ton is intended to apply to cargo vessels, steam and sail. No cargo steamers for ocean work are now built in the United States of a speed of less than 10 knots an hour, and except for one or two small special trades, no cargo steamers are built here or elsewhere of a speed of more than 12 or, at the most, 13 knots an hour.

Nearly all steamers of 14 knots or upward built anywhere in the world are constructed for mail subsidized companies or for some special short-distance passenger service.

It may be said that virtually the whole rough-cargo-carrying fleet of the entire world is composed of vessels of a speed of from 8 knots to 13 knots an hour, and in the United States of a speed of from 10 knots to 13 knots. Thus these vessels form a fairly homogeneous class, and there is really no need of grading the subventions to these vessels according to the rate of speed they make per hour. Their main purpose is to carry cargo at economical rates rather than to get to their destination quickly.

Previous shipping bills have had subventions elaborately graded according to the knots of speed, and this feature has been objected to, especially by Senators from agricultural States as, in effect, a discrimination against our agricultural exports in favor of fast passenger steamers carrying express freight. This is the chief reason why in the present bill no effort was made to offer speed premiums and why only moderate requirements as to speed were made of the proposed new mail lines to South America, Asia, etc.

If the flat rate of $5 per gross ton to all cargo vessels regardless of speed discriminates in its effect in favor of any interest, it is in favor of the interests of the cotton planters of the South, the lumbermen of the South and Northwest, and the farmers producing wheat, grain, and provisions in the interior. The greater part in value, as well as in bulk, of the exports of this country consists of agricultural products, and it was thought by the Commission that the American merchant marine should be especially adapted to the transportation of these agricultural products to distant markets. That other nations, like Great Britain and Germany, subsidize mail lines alone and not these useful "tramp" steamers, fit for carrying grain, cotton, lumber, provisions, etc., is no reason why the United States should blindly follow their example. After a few years the expenditures under this bill to an increased fleet of "tramp" or cargo vessels will be greater than to all the new mail lines proposed. As a member of the late Merchant Marine Commission I have no apology to offer for this, though it is admitted to be contrary to the practice of Great Britain and Germany. The bulky cotton bales, the lumber, the grain, and the provisions which our country exports so largely can be carried economically only in vessels of slow or moderate speed. To grade up the cargo subventions according to speed would be in effect to discriminate against the lumber and cotton exports out of southern ports in favor of swifter vessels carrying express freight or compact manufactured goods. The very point which the Senator from Georgia criticises is one which is of most direct and immediate advantage to the producers of the Southern States and the commerce of the southern seaports.

It is objected, Mr. President, that the cargo steamers will not give us "the regular and efficient service repeatedly mentioned in the report of the Commission." By regular and efficient service in this connection is meant not the fixed schedule of mail lines, whose ships go out on the stroke of 12 and arrive on a certain day and perhaps a certain hour at Manila or Rio Janeiro, but the regular and efficient service performed by the cargo vessel, which sails whenever its holds are full and arrives after a reasonable time, but not at any set hour, at its foreign destination. One value of a cargo fleet such as is provided for in section 2 is its flexibility. Such a fleet is regular and efficient in that it trades out of the ports of the United States to any port in the world where American goods are needed.

To have a fleet of regular mail steamers, even steamers of moderate speed, with large cargo capacity, such as are provided for in this bill, is not enough. Many of the commodities which we import heavily, like sugar, hemp, etc., are goods to be shipped at certain seasons when demand for tonnage very greatly increases but to fall away again after the crop is shipped. This kind of commerce can not be handled by mail liners exclusively. There must be also a certain amount of cargo tonnage which can be readily shifted as is required from one country to another. And in connection with mail lines all over the world, a great and increasing quantity of cargo tonnage, pure and simple, is being operated. For the subsidized mail companies of Europe all maintain cargo nonpassenger ships in addition to their passenger mail liners.

There is no nation in the world which needs a fleet of rough cargo vessels of its own more than the United States. And there need be no fear that such vessels, built for this cargo subvention of $5 per gross ton, will be wandering over the world most of the time carrying cargoes for other nations. Though this bill does not require, in set terms, that these cargo vessels shall carry no cargoes except those from or to the United States, yet in practical experience, it will be found that these American vessels will seldom carry any but our own export or import cargoes. Such cargo vessels, steam and sail, as we now have, are employed almost exclusively in American foreign commerce. American ships in any other than American export or import trade are seldom heard of. It will be the same for ships built for this subvention. In the first place, the subvention, unlike the enormous French subsidies, does not begin to be large enough to enable any vessel to run in ballast anywhere. And, in the second place, the owners of these vessels will prefer to have their ships return as directly as possible to the United States, where their repairs must be made, and where their business can be best adjusted.

But an absolute requirement that American vessels to receive this cargo subvention should go out from the United States and return immediately to the United States from the foreign port where they discharged their cargo would be to embarrass shipowners and destroy much of the benefit of this subvention. An American vessel going out, for instance, to Buenos Ayres with a cargo of American goods might not find a return cargo available at that port, but might have a chance to get a return cargo at Rio Janeiro and to carry a freight of Argentine goods to Rio in place of ballast. To say that this American ship should not take this cargo, but should proceed in ballast, leaving the cargo to be carried by a competing foreign ship, would be in effect a discrimination by American law against the American vessel. So would be a requirement that if she could find no return cargo at Buenos Ayres she must come direct, empty and unprofitable, to the United States. That would mean that the ship on her next outward voyage would have to charge freight rates high enough to cover the cost of her unprofitable inward voyage from Buenos Ayres.

As a general rule, however, an American ship going out to Buenos Ayres or Shanghai would make every endeavor to secure a return cargo from the same port, and would not go to another port unless absolutely compelled to do so.

Not until our merchant marine has grown so large that it can carry all our American commerce will American ships make a practice of carrying for other nations and seeking cargoes all over the world. When that time comes no subvention will be needed and none will be given.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether these cargo ships would serve the purpose covered by the auxiliaries to which Admiral Dewey refers as ammunition ships, colliers, supply ships, etc.?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; they will serve for everything except for fast scouts.

Mr. NEWLANDS. For everything except the fast scouts?

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely so. The intention is to impress them into service if they should be needed for that purpose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Has the Senator any information as to what number of such ships would be required now to meet the demands of our Navy and what their cost would be?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, does the Senator mean if we are at war with Mexico or with Great Britain or with Russia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course I understand that there would be a different demand in each case; but I simply wish to know whether the Navy Department has made any estimates at all covering this class of auxiliaries, just as they make estimates regarding the vessels that are used in actual war.

Mr. GALLINGER. They could not do so unless they should assume that we were at war with some particular power and that it was to continue a certain length of time, which, of course, it would be impossible for them to do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Right on that line, will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry only for information?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My inquiry does not express my own views, because I can not say that I have any views on this subject, but, as I understand it, the disadvantages under which American ships labor are these: First, the cost of construction in this country is greater than abroad——

Mr. GALLINGER. Very much greater.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Second, that the cost of administration is greater in this country than it is abroad——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And, as American ships come in competition with their foreign rivals, it is impossible for them to make money so long as the construction of ships in this country costs more and their administration costs more.

Now, then, would it not be possible, following out the suggestion of this bill, to organize our aid upon these lines: To have the Navy construct not only ships that are to be used in actual war, but also the ships which are necessary as auxiliaries, or, at all events, a portion of them, and then have those ships used in time of peace as cargo ships? Would it not be possible also, in addition, to enlarge the idea of this bill regarding the volunteer reserve?

Mr. GALLINGER. That we have done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. We have that now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I fear the Senator has not read the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to enlarge the idea that you have in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh!

Mr. NEWLANDS. And enlarge its operations. As I understand it, this bill calls ultimately for about 10,000 men, who are to be employed on these merchant ships, and they are to be in the actual service of the Government, subject to call at any time when needed. We all realize, of course, the importance, inasmuch as we are building a large navy, of having men to man the ships, to be called upon in case of war to meet an emergency.

It strikes me that the extra pay that you give these men will not cover the difference between the wages paid to American sailors in our commerce and the wages paid to foreign sailors. It will be necessary, therefore, to enlarge the amount paid annually to each one of these men who enlists in the American Navy and yet serves in the commercial marine. As I understand it, we allow only an annual retainer of $35 for an ordinary seaman; and I believe that the ordinary wages of our seamen in this country are more than 50 per cent in excess of the wages paid upon foreign ships. Now, if you can not in that extra compensation equalize the difference, I do not see how it is going to encourage and enlarge this naval reserve for which you provide.

Right in that connection, I ask whether we can not, by enlarging the other features of this bill, provide for the actual construction of these auxiliaries by the United States Government. They can be made the property of the Government, to be used in time of peace in commerce. I inquire also, whether we can not enlarge this reserve, giving them larger wages, subject, of course, to be called at any time in case of war—whether that would not be a more efficient way of giving this aid?

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator think it desirable for the Government to take possession of the great manufacturing establishments, where they build guns and make powder and all those things that would be needed in case of war, and then contract it out to private parties to run them?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. It could be done, no doubt. The Government could do almost anything.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not mean that. But here is a case where the Government admittedly must give aid of some kind in order to promote the merchant marine. It is utterly impossible to enlarge the merchant marine under existing conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I prefer that the Senator should wait until I close my sentence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I propose is that if the Government does put out any money it shall own the thing upon which the money is put out, and own it for all time, and that if the Government is to organize this great naval reserve, to be called upon in case of war, we should make the compensation adequate, so that we may accomplish the purpose the Senator has in view.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly that could be done, but it is not going to be done. So we may as well dismiss it. The Senator would find that if he should introduce a bill for that purpose it would not get very far, not even as far as this bill has, in consideration.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The suggestion may be entirely impracticable, because it is largely dependent upon the cost of these vessels; but it strikes me we are now spending a very large amount of money upon a navy, and that we might as well spend a little less upon war ships in the future and a little more upon these auxiliaries, and thus accomplish the development not only of our Navy, but also of our merchant marine.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am inclined to sympathize with that suggestion of the Senator that to spend a little less money on the Navy—although I think we are going to spend less on the Navy in the future—and more on the merchant marine would be a good investment for the United States. I think the Senator is right in that.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to ask a question, simply for information; and that is, has there been any estimate of the probable expenditure under this bill for the first year?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I will say to the Senator that if the provision relating to increased tonnage had remained in the bill, it would have put into the Treasury about $700,000 the first year. That having gone out of the bill, if it is not restored, there will be a small amount required, but very little the first year, because, of course, ships will not be built in the first year, and this subvention will not be paid.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator about how much does he think would be taken from the Treasury at the end of the tenth year?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will refer to the report, he will find it stated there; but of course the estimate is approximate at best, for no man can tell whether all these mail lines will be established or not. If they should be and the bill should become operative in its entirety, the best estimate we could make was that at the end of ten years the entire amount paid out will be a little over $40,000,000.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator has said it would take about $40,000,000 at the end of ten years. Now, the Senator says that our merchants, our farmers, and our producers may ship their manufactured products and their farm products abroad in foreign ships owned by Frenchmen, Germans, and Englishmen, and ship them in foreign bottoms instead of in American bottoms, because they can ship them more cheaply.

Mr. GALLINGER. I never admitted that.

Mr. CLAY. But they do ship them cheaper.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; they do not ship them cheaper. There are very few American ships in which to ship anything.

Mr. CLAY. I understand that the Senator contends that the owner of an English ship or a German ship or a French ship can operate it cheaper than an American can operate an American ship?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably.

Mr. CLAY. Consequently the farmer, the cotton producer, the wheat grower, and the manufacturer now ship entirely in foreign bottoms.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is because there are none others in which they can ship.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator says that Americans can not afford to put their money into American ships——

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. CLAY. Because the freight rates are so low——

Mr. GALLINGER. Not the freight rates.

Mr. CLAY. Well, I mean that the American shipowner can not operate his ship as cheaply as can the foreigner, and consequently the American producers and the American manufacturers seek foreign ships to send their merchandise and farm products abroad.

Mr. GALLINGER. They can not find any others.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator this question: Suppose this bill passes and the merchant marine is increased, does the Senator think that the owner of farm products and of manufactured products would be able to get any cheaper freight rates in exporting their products than they do at the present time?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should hope so, but I am not going into the realm of prophecy. I know that if the product of an American factory or an American farm were sent to a foreign market in an American ship it would get better attention than if it should go there in a foreign ship in competition with foreign products. I feel sure on that point.

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator has there been any complaint in regard to our exports in foreign ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will read the testimony——

Mr. CLAY. I believe our exports are greater now than at any other period in our history.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. They have grown very rapidly and, I think, very satisfactorily.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will read the testimony taken, for instance, in the city of Cleveland, he will see that very serious complaint has been found by American producers. They complain that their goods were damaged and they got no redress, and that when the goods were landed in a foreign country no attention was paid to them, they being landed there by foreign ships. They felt sure that it was very desirable, so far as their interests were concerned, to have American ships in which to transport American goods. These three volumes are full of that sort of testimony.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the obstacle to the development without governmental aid to our merchant marine is considered to be twofold.

Mr. GALLINGER. Threefold.

Mr. SPOONER. As I recall, twofold.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps the Senator has overlooked the subsidies given by foreign governments.

Mr. SPOONER. First, the contention that it costs at least, as I recollect, 25 per cent more to build ships in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. From 35 to 40 per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it has increased very much since the debate on the Hanna-Frye subsidy bill. At that time it was 25 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is barely possible it has increased. A great many things have increased.

Mr. SPOONER. Call it 30 per cent. We will say it costs 30 per cent more to construct a ship in the United States than it does to construct the same ship abroad. My recollection is that the next obstacle was that it cost about 33 per cent more to operate a ship under the American flag.

Mr. GALLINGER. More probably, it should be at 25 per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, 25 per cent. It was over 30; but say it costs 25 per cent more to operate a ship under our flag than it does under a foreign flag. The scheme of this bill is limited to ten years.

Mr. GALLINGER. The subsidy to a given ship is for ten years.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator anticipate that when the ten years shall have expired and $40,000,000 shall have been paid, it will then cost any less to build American ships, as compared with the same kind of foreign ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly not.

Mr. SPOONER. Or any less to operate the ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly not.

Mr. SPOONER. Then does it, or does it not, follow that this is the beginning only of a policy which is to be more or less perpetual?

Mr. LODGE. England has a regular scheme of subsidies.

Mr. SPOONER. I know England has. That is what I am trying to get at—whether we are not starting on a plan of subsidy which is to be permanent, just as is the subsidy plan of England.

Mr. GALLINGER. England has had some experience to the contrary. I recollect one great steamship line of England which for quite a number of years received a subvention of a million and a half dollars, but it has established such a trade with the countries to which its steamers sail that during the past year the subvention has been reduced to $400,000.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course it is not expected, nor, I suppose, is it to be desired that the labor cost of ship construction in this country shall grow less——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not to be expected.

Mr. SPOONER. And there is no good reason to suppose that the cost of operating ships will grow less?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is this to be said on that point, if the Senator will permit me, that if we commence building the ships and we build enough to standardize them, we will build ships very much cheaper than we can to-day.

Mr. LODGE. That point was repeatedly brought out in the testimony.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. I went into a shipyard in New York some time ago, and I found on the stocks, what? I found a war ship, a ship for the coastwise trade, a ferryboat, and another small vessel of some kind or other, a yacht, I believe. If that shipyard were building twenty steamships of a certain type for this cargo-carrying trade, for instance, they would standardize them, and build them, I do not know how much cheaper, but very much cheaper, just as we are building locomotives and bridges in this country very much cheaper because we have them standardized. I do not know what the difference would be, but it would be very considerable.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to give him some information?

Mr. SPOONER. I am only asking for information.

Mr. FRYE. I know something about ships.

Mr. SPOONER. I know very little about them, and that is why I prefer to have the Senator from Maine give me information.

Mr. FRYE. If either the shipping bill which passed the Senate in 1901 or the bill which passed the Senate in 1900 and was mutilated in the House had become a law I have no doubt that in less than ten years we should have built ships in American yards as cheaply as they build them on the Clyde. When you build ships by the wholesale you can do the work for very much less than when you now and then build one ship. For instance, I visited Cramp's shipyard, and Mr. Cramp told me that he could build two ships of the same tonnage for 10 per cent less than he could build one ship. The reason they build ships more cheaply on the Clyde is because there will be a dozen ships being constructed at the same time, and the carpenters and blacksmiths and other workmen—the crews—move from one ship to the other ship, doing precisely the same work on each. But if you are building one ship and next to it a yacht, the yacht being built in parlor fashion and magnificently fitted in every direction, you must have a crew alone for that single yacht, and your man who is working on the merchant ship is not fit at all to work on the yacht. I have not a shadow of doubt that if either of the bills to which I have referred had become a law we would have been constructing ships as cheaply as they build them on the Clyde, and would still have been paying the higher wages. Why? Because our carpenters, our ship blacksmiths, and the workmen generally on our ships are worth every day at least 33⅓ per cent more than the workmen on the Clyde.

I was out on the Clyde one day. It was on a Friday, and I was very anxious to see the leading shipbuilder on the Clyde and obtain some information from him. I went to our American consul there and asked him to telephone to Mr. Thompson and ask when I could interview him; that I wanted to do it when his yards were in operation, and whether or not they were then in operation. He telephoned back: "No; they are not in operation on Friday." Then I inquired whether or not they would be operating on Saturday. "No; they will not be operating Saturday." Then I inquired whether they would be operating on Monday. The answer was, "No; they will not be operating on Monday." That struck me as a most curious condition of things in shipbuilding, because in this country we work every day and only rest on Sunday. So I made further inquiry, and finally found Mr. Thompson. He said to me: "Did you know that there was to be a fair in Glasgow on Saturday?" I said, "Yes; I have seen it mentioned in the press that there is to be a fair on Saturday." "Well," said he, "the men that work for me very largely save all the money they can for that fair. They leave off work on Friday; they get drunk on Saturday; they keep drunk on Sunday, and they are not fit to work on Monday." You do not find anything of that kind in an American shipyard, and, while the wages here are at least 33⅓ per cent higher than they are on the Clyde, I have not the shadow of a doubt, if we could build ships here by the wholesale as they build them on the Clyde, in every shipyard we would be constructing ships as cheaply as they are being constructed on the Clyde.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from Maine not believe that American workmen who remain sober can easily and successfully compete against foreign workmen who practice that kind of intemperance?

Mr. FRYE. I have not a doubt about it.

Mr. BAILEY. Surely we do not need to help with subsidies from the Public Treasury sober, industrious, and intelligent American mechanics to compete with foreign workmen who indulge in protracted debauches.

Mr. FRYE. But you do need help from the American Treasury to employ American workmen in building ships. We are building no ships for the foreign trade. The only ships we are building are for the coastwise trade. I do not believe there are two ships in the United States of America to-day being built for the foreign trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, no order has been given for five years.

Mr. FRYE. Not an order for five years.

Mr. BAILEY. My own opinion is that a sober, industrious American is worth 33⅓ per cent more, measured by the results of his work, than any drunken foreigner.

Mr. FRYE. Right at that point let me say I do not care much about this difference in the cost of building a ship. Suppose it costs 30 per cent more to-day to build a ship in our country than it does abroad, that 30 per cent is spread over twenty years—the life of a ship. It is a bagatelle. I am not worrying about that. Our trouble is that after the ship is built you can not sail it; that is the trouble. If to-day you could buy for 50 per cent less than it is worth a British ship and sell it to an American citizen, he could not afford to operate it against a German ship or an Italian ship, and I doubt if he could against a British ship.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, the Commission called, among other witnesses, a member of the firm of Kidder, Peabody & Co., of Boston, the great bankers. The question was asked by the chairman whether, if we could have absolutely free ships from anywhere in the world, they would put any money into the business. The answer came at once "No; not a dollar; not unless you equalize other conditions."

Mr. FRYE. Of course; and the condition to be equalized is not the difference in the cost of the ship. The difference to be equalized is the cost of operating the ship after you have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course there is a great difference in the cost, the Senator will admit, as our shipyards are constituted now, building one ship of one type and another of another.

Mr. FRYE. I think about 35 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think just about.

Mr. LODGE. That would be overcome.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be overcome.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I am undertaking to show—that it can be overcome if our shipbuilders can build by wholesale instead of retail.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FRYE. I should like to say one word more, if the Senator will allow me.

It is said that ordinary steamships are not subsidized by foreign countries; that only the fast steamships are subsidized. Trading ships are not subsidized by Great Britain, but other countries subsidize them. France subsidizes every freight ship. The William P. Frye, one of the finest ships in the world, was laid up in San Francisco four months, utterly unable to get freight, because French ships were there taking on cargoes.

Mr. MALLORY. Was not that because the French ships could take cargoes at much lower rates than American ships or ships of other nationalities?

Mr. FRYE. They were taking freight for less than any American ship could take it under present conditions. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. While Germany does not subsidize her cargo ships, Germany gives all sorts of advantages to her shipbuilding concerns by transporting material of which ships are constructed at a very much lower rate of freight all over the Empire than she does for private parties, and in various other ways she aids the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. FRYE. I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Have I the floor, or has some one else?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. FRYE. I did not expect to get into the discussion at this time——

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad the Senator did.

Mr. FRYE. I was waiting to hear somebody on the other side speak, to whom I might reply. I do not like to debate a question where it is entirely on one side. But I was going to remark that 80 per cent of all the steamships of 14 knots and up in the world are to-day subsidized, and every steamship in the world of 16 knots and up is subsidized, except six.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I venture to ask the Senator from Maine whether he does not think we are fortunate if foreign governments will pay their ships to haul our freight cheaper than ours will, and leave us to use our revenues and resources in some better way?

Mr. FRYE. No; I do not.

Mr. BAILEY. If every foreign government will pay its shipowners to haul our cotton and wheat and merchandise of every kind cheaper than we can haul them ourselves, it seems to me they do us a great service.

Mr. GALLINGER. And get $200,000,000 of American money thereby to distribute in foreign countries?

Mr. BAILEY. While they are being paid that sum to conduct a business which to us would be a losing business, our brawn and muscle and intelligence and capital can be employed in a profitable business.

Mr. GALLINGER. But $200,000,000 of our money goes to foreign nations.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. If some man will do a service for me for less than I can perform it for myself, I will pay him the smaller amount to perform it, and I will engage in some business that will leave me a profit after I have paid him.

Mr. GALLINGER. But if the $200,000,000 were distributed here it might give employment to a great many American mechanics and workingmen who are possibly seeking employment now.

Mr. BAILEY. We have heard that there are no unemployed American workingmen since the Dingley bill became operative.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very few since the Gorman-Wilson bill went out of operation—very few.

Mr. BAILEY. I remember that more of them were idle under the McKinley bill than there were under what the Senator is pleased to call the "Gorman-Wilson bill."

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator——

Mr. BAILEY. I remember that one of the most severe industrial crises in the history of the country occurred under the McKinley bill. I have never been shallow enough——

Mr. GALLINGER. After a Democrat was elected President.

Mr. BAILEY. No; we elected him during the crisis.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Harrison was defeated because of the Homestead strike, which occurred during his Administration.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Homestead strike occurred when men were getting as high as seventeen to twenty dollars a day. I chance to have made an investigation of the Homestead strike.

Mr. BAILEY. That only illustrates that when an American is prosperous he wants to be more prosperous.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but he never can expect it under free trade.

Mr. BAILEY. And he can never realize it under protection. It is the difference between expectation and realization.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems as though he is doing it now, except in the one unprotected industry, which is that of shipping. It has no protection, and it is not profitable.

Mr. BAILEY. All I rose to say, and it seemed to me pertinent at this point, was that if the nations of the world will take money from their treasury and employ their people to perform for us a given service for less than we can perform it for ourselves, they are doing us a great service, because they leave us to employ our capital and labor in more profitable enterprises.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island if the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] does not desire to be heard further.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Texas would apply the same reasoning to every industry in the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Rhode Island knows I would.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Rhode Island knows that I believe that American intelligence and American skill and American capital, when left to their own devices, produce the best results.

Mr. ALDRICH. And you would have all the people of the United States engaged in raising cotton and corn.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; I would not, because they could not all profitably engage in it.

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. BAILEY. But I would never tax the man who does not raise cotton or corn or wheat in order to hire somebody else to engage in a losing business, and the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a logical free-trade argument, and it is one which very few members of the Senator's party have the courage to make.

Mr. BAILEY. I trust that I have always the courage to express my candid opinion. I am not sometimes called a "protectionist" because I can not follow my Republican friends when they come to take the tariff off of the only article grown by the farmer of the United States which is susceptible of advantage under the tariff. When they come to remit or reduce the duty on sugar for the benefit of the American Sugar Refining Company, I am unable to follow them, and now and then somebody suggests that I am a protectionist.

When I insist that the man who imports wool shall pay a duty on it just like the man who imports woolen goods, some gentleman ventures to assert that I am influenced by the fact that some of my constituents have sheep. But those suggestions never disturb me. If we had a Constitution under which we could apportion the taxes of the United States according to wealth instead of according to numbers, then I would be ready to take down every custom-house in the United States. But I have sense enough to know how utterly impossible that is. I know that as long as you can not apportion taxes according to wealth instead of population, we must continue to collect an enormous sum through the custom-houses, and I perfectly understand that every time you levy a duty, though you levy it purely for revenue, you afford an incidental protection. But with me that is a regrettable incident rather than an argument.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator from Maine in a moment.

When the Senator from Texas suggested that he was sometimes charged with being a protectionist, I did not know but that it was because he, by his eloquence, inveigled the Congress into paying out of the public Treasury a half million dollars to destroy the boll weevil in his State——

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. One of the worst subsidies ever heard of in any government.

Mr. BAILEY. No more than that I voted for an appropriation of a half million dollars to destroy the foot-and-mouth disease in New England.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is in the same line. That was a subsidy.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator from New Hampshire, of course, will recognize the difference between voting a pure appropriation, uncoupled with any exercise of power, and a vote which is generally accompanied with some exercise of governmental power.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire can not differentiate to that extent, so far as the result is concerned.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from New Hampshire can, but it does not suit his convenience to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. I did not know I was going to get up a tariff discussion here.

Mr. BAILEY. One always does that when the Senator from Rhode Island is around.

Mr. FRYE. I will retire from the debate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I think I brought on this engagement, although I have rather been lost in the shuffle. I am glad I put the question to the Senator from New Hampshire which I did, and I know every Senator will join me in that, because it has given us the pleasure of hearing the voice of the Senator from Maine in debate again after a long time.

Mr. FRYE. Thanks to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I infer from what the Senator from Maine says that he anticipates that, under the operation of this subsidy during the ten years, it may come about that ships may be constructed in the United States at about the cost of similar ships constructed abroad. I have not heard anyone say—I do not know what the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Maine may say about it—that there is any reason to anticipate that at the expiration of the subsidy period the relative disadvantage in the cost of operating will have appreciably diminished; nor, of course, do I suppose there is any reason to think that the disadvantage arising from foreign subventions will have much, if any, diminished. So really this is a permanent policy upon which the country is invited to enter, and no Senator who advocates the bill expects that at the expiration of the ten years, during which $40,000,000 will have been paid, the system will be at an end, but we are to go on with it indefinitely.

That is no argument to me against embarking upon it, but I think the people ought to know fairly and frankly what is expected in that regard from the operation of this bill among those who have devised it and are advocating its passage. I rose for information on those two points.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I think the answer to the question he has asked is in the line of evolution and development. It is illustrated by the way we have developed the operation of our steamships at this time. Formerly, when the Great Eastern was built, it took five times the quantity of coal to develop a horsepower that it now does.

Then, again, first there was the single-expansion engine; then the double-expansion; then the triple-expansion engine; then the quadruple-expansion, and to-day the Senator has referred to the Cunarder being built which will have a turbine engine. Those engaged in building vessels are improving and are developing, and I believe that in ten years from this time, judged by the development that has been going on in the building and operation of ships and the economy of their machinery, we will be masters of the situation.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me—it probably escaped his attention—but the Merchant Marine Commission took some very interesting testimony on the turbine question, which I know the Senator will read with interest.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the Senator will develop that thought. We have been making wonderful progress in the fuel question.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not the Senator from California expect that our competitors will also avail themselves of the turbine engine?

Mr. PERKINS. In greater or less degree.

Mr. SPOONER. Possibly greater.

Mr. PERKINS. A few years since geologists declared there was no petroleum in California. We now produce more crude petroleum than any other State in the Union, and only to-day the Senate passed a bill making two ports—Monterey and San Luis Obispo—ports of entry, for the very purpose of exporting the crude petroleum of our State.

Electricity to-day is in its infancy. Yet we are running elevators and street cars and machinery in many of our principal cities of the West by water coming from the melting of the snows in the mountains. It runs motors which generate electricity and electricity is transmitted 150 miles, where it performs its function. We must also consider the question of storing electricity to be used as motive power in propelling ships.

So, I say, give us a subsidy. I do not own a dollar in any steamship. I have had my experience. I speak only for the public interest. I would rather have a railroad, and have a railroad commission to regulate its rates, than to own any steamship in the world, so far as an investment is concerned. But I believe we are moving in the right direction to foster and build up this industry by giving a subvention and pay for transporting the mail, and let the Stars and Stripes fly as they did once when you and I—no, you were not a sailor boy, but you might have been if you had been born on the coast of Maine, where the Senator from Maine and I first saw the light of day. At that time one could visit the ports of Liverpool and Havre and Bremen and other European ports and there see ten ships flying the Stars and Stripes to one flying the flag of any other nation.

But we had a little bit of internecine strife, and our Yankees put their vessels under foreign flags, and there was so much better inducement to develop the mines and agricultural interests of our country that we did not go to building ships again. We want to turn the attention of the people to it now. I believe the Commission has done a splendid work.

One of the best features in the bill is that which compels foreign shipowners to pay a tonnage due to our country the same as they compel us to pay dues in visiting their ports. We are improving our harbors; improving our rivers; we are improving our ports; we are building light-houses and buoying our rivers and harbors; and we are building life-saving stations. Who for? Not for the benefit of American commerce, but for the benefit of the ships of foreign countries. Therefore let us do something for our own people, for our own country, and for our own ships.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator from Maine to say that within a few years, if this subsidy measure is passed, we will be able to construct ships as cheaply as any country in the world. I understood the Senator from California to say that we are making rapid progress in the operation of ships; that we operate them now much more cheaply than we did a few years ago; and I understood the Senator to say that within a period of eight or ten years we will be able to compete with any country in the world in the operation of ships.

The Senator says all we want is a subsidy for about ten years, and then we will operate ships as cheaply as the people of any other country. Did I understand my friend correctly?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the Senator from Georgia, who is usually very correct—I have had the honor of serving with him for many years upon committees—who is generally public spirited and willing to take hold of every question that is a live issue and discuss it fairly, has not quoted the Senator from Maine or the Senator from California correctly on this proposition. But I do say we are mining the iron ore, we are putting it into pig iron, we are running the pig iron into ingots of steel, and we are taking the ingots of steel and making them into sheets of steel which are used in the building of our ships, for 50 per cent less than we did twenty years ago. That is in the construction of the vessel; and in the machinery department we use less men. Down in the coal hold we use now a liquid fuel which requires only a man to stand by the valve and turn it on and turn it off.

Mr. CLAY. We are operating ships now much more cheaply than we did a few years ago?

Mr. PERKINS. We are improving. We are making progress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I think I must be given a chance to conclude.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield further.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is necessary to have a short executive session.

Mr. PERKINS. I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

I do not quite agree with the Senator from Maine that we will be able to build ships in the near future as cheaply as foreign countries, but we will approximate to it.

Mr. FRYE. As cheaply as Great Britain, I said.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly so. But there are other obstacles which we have to encounter.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. GALLINGER. I want, further, in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, to say that I do not know whether the subvention, if we give it for ten years, will have to be continued beyond that period. It will depend upon circumstances. If we have ships to go to South America and Africa and the Orient, we will establish great American mercantile houses. They will be presided over by Americans. They will establish trade with those countries; at least we expect to do that. Those ships will have cargoes during the ten years, and my judgment is that it will result in giving them a continuing business, after the ten years expire, without regard to the subventions. But we may have to continue them. I am not going to enter, as I said a moment ago, into the realm of prophecy, because we do not know what will happen in ten years from now. I will not be here. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be here. He is yet a young man. But the people, ten years from now, if we give this subvention and we live through it, can decide the question of its continuance. It amounts to only $4,000,000 a year. We appropriate $140,000,000 a year for pensions, and we do not mind it; $100,000,000 to our Navy, and we do not complain about it; and this pittance of $4,000,000 is not going to bankrupt this great Government of ours or do very great detriment to any interest. I am not going to worry about what may happen ten years from now, when I will be gathered to my fathers, and a good many of my associates will be in the same condition.

I now yield to the Senator from Rhode Island, and then I will continue for a very few minutes, and stop.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, my troubles about this bill are not along the lines suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I am afraid there is not enough in this bill in the way of subsidy, subvention, or whatever you please to call it to develop the American mercantile marine. I do not expect that within the ten years all of these inequalities will be disposed of; and I think so long as the level of wages in this country is so much higher than that of a great many other countries abroad these inequalities will exist. I have no idea that in ten years from now we shall be in a position to contest on equal terms for the supremacy of or for equal status upon the sea.

I shall be very glad to vote, if I happen to be here, as I shall not, and I hope my successor will be equally glad to vote, even a much larger sum than that for the purpose of securing a result which seems to me extremely desirable and patriotic, and that is, to build up American shipping; and the greater the inequality the more necessity there will be for making appropriations for this purpose. I hope the policy which will be inaugurated by the passage of the pending bill will be continued, and that the amount to be appropriated will be increased until we shall have a creditable representation upon the seas of the world.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in reply, if I may. If the Senator from Rhode Island supposes that he is antagonizing my position at all, he is mistaken. I am as anxious to see a merchant marine built up in the United States as is the Senator, and I am as willing as he is that the sum requisite shall be expended to that end if it can be expended without favoritism and with reasonable prospect of efficiency. But we have hitherto had measures carefully prepared which we were asked to support, designed to build up the merchant marine of the United States. They were thoroughly debated. One was a bill calculated, in my judgment, not only to fail in accomplishing the purpose that was intended, but distinctly and inevitably a bill of favoritism, excluding almost every possible public interest.

It is not enough to say of a bill that it is a measure to build up our merchant marine, in order to command support for it among men who think rather than who sentimentalize. I suppose every man in this body is anxious to see the merchant marine upbuilded. Every man is anxious to see the flag of the United States float over the masts of American ships in every harbor under every sky.

We are dealing here with legislation. It is perfectly legitimate and friendly, moreover, to ascertain, if it be possible, whether a given measure is so drawn as to accomplish the purpose in view. I have not been able to study this bill. It is supported upon the two or three grounds which I mentioned: First, the disparity in cost in the construction of a ship in this country and other countries; second, in the cost of operation; third, in the matter of foreign subventions.

The people of the United States, I take it, are perfectly willing to spend $40,000,000 or $80,000,000 to build up a merchant marine if the result of it will be cheaper transportation by American ships or transportation as cheap by American ships of the products of the farm and the factory and the productive industries of the United States. Will this bill do it?

Mr. GALLINGER. If it will not do it, then we will not have any ships to which to give subventions.

Mr. SPOONER. It may do so, but I indicated no opposition to the experiment——

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. By asking the Senator who has the bill in charge whether its friends deemed it a mere experiment, and whether it was intended to expend $40,000,000 under the scheme of a ten years' contract, leaving the owner of every ship constructed or encouraged by this subsidy to say at the expiration of the ten years it was bad faith on the part of the Government of the United States to have tolled us into the construction of these ships, placing them upon the sea, and then cutting off our subsidy when still in competition with foreign subsidies, still sailing ships at a higher cost than the cost of sailing ships under other flags. The Senator from Rhode Island, the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from New Hampshire, and Senators who have studied this subject who live on the tide water, whose people are intensely interested directly in this subject——

Mr. GALLINGER. Not my people.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, you have a port.

Mr. ALDRICH. Nor mine.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the whole Atlantic coast is directly interested in it. But no matter about that. It is a large subject. We are all interested in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. SPOONER. And in supporting any bill which will accomplish the purpose, if at the end of ten years it is reasonably certain that we will be where we are to-day, with the same difference in the cost of constructing ships, with the same difference in the cost of operating ships, with the same impediment or obstruction in the way of foreign subventions or enlarged subventions, it is debatable, Mr. President, whether it is not a waste of the people's money, and whether we should engage in what is admitted to be an experiment, and very possibly, if not probably, foredoomed to be a wasteful and a futile experiment.

Now, I hope this bill does not mean that. The questions which I put to the Senator were not, as my friend from Rhode Island seemed to think, indicative of opposition to a sane, well-settled, and carefully guarded subsidy bill. If this is that, I shall certainly favor it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I very much want to conclude, but I will yield to my good friend from Minnesota——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. For a question. I will say to the Senator this bill will be up to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to say a few words, partly in response to what the Senator from Rhode Island has said and partly in response to what the Senator from Wisconsin has said, upon a little subject that has not been brought into this discussion, and I shall be very brief. I shall take not more than five, or, at the outside, not more than ten minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall want to have some orators to-morrow. Could not the Senator desist?

Mr. NELSON. Then you had better let me in to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to vote for this bill, and I hope it will accomplish what its friends aim to accomplish by it. In one respect the Senator from Rhode Island is correct. It does not go far enough. There is one subsidy which every maritime nation grants that we do not grant. We are the only maritime country in the world that has not free ships. In any other country under the sun that has a merchant marine that I know of, those who sail the ships can buy their ships wherever they have a mind to. Our shipbuilding industry in this country is the only statutory monopoly that I know of on the statute books of the United States. We have monopolies in various industries, but we have them outside of the law. However, in the industry of shipbuilding we have an absolute statutory monopoly.

Every vessel in the coastwise trade must be built in an American yard, and no vessel engaged in the foreign trade can ever sail under the American flag unless it is built in this country, giving the shipbuilders of this country what no other industry in the country has—an absolute monopoly.

I can import a coat from abroad; I can buy a yard of woolen goods, or I can buy almost any other commodity abroad, if I pay the tariff duty on it; but I can not get anything in the shape of a ship——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. NELSON. I want to finish. It is my opinion, and it is my honest opinion, that you can grant subsidies as much as you please, but you will never put our shipping on a par with other countries until you grant them that one subsidy which every other maritime country has on the face of the earth, and that is free ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me right there?

Mr. NELSON. If you have got to protect your shipbuilding industry, protect it like you do every other industry—put a tariff on it, but do not give it an absolute monopoly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say right there, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment——

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the friends of this bill I am upon the Committee on Commerce and I acquiesced in reporting the bill, and I shall vote for it as an experiment, but my honest conviction is that you can pass this bill or any other subsidy measure and you will never rehabilitate American shipping until you put it on a footing of equality with the other maritime nations of the world and give them free ships. If you have got to protect your shipbuilding industry, give them a bonus, but put the American ships on a par with the ships of other countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator did not practice reciprocity. I yielded to him and he would not yield to me. I will now make in my own time the suggestion I desired to make. The Senator advocates free ships. The Merchant Marine Commission took a great deal of testimony on that point, and I do not know any member of that Commission, Republican or Democrat, who thinks we will get any relief from free ships.

The Senator says we can import foreign goods of other kinds and pay the tariff duty on them and bring them into this country. We can import every dollar's worth of material that goes into an American ship for the foreign trade without paying any duty on it under existing law—absolutely so, under the provisions of the Dingley tariff law. In that respect we have the advantage in shipbuilding over the importation of goods for any other purpose. So we have practically free ships, if Americans want to invest their money in building ships for the foreign trade. That is my answer to that.

Now, Mr. President, I will close——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I will have to yield, although I do want to finish.

Mr. SPOONER. I only wish to ask a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Section 4 provides, in the early part—

That the contracts provided for in section 3 shall be for a period of one year, and shall be renewed from time to time; but no vessel—

That is, no one vessel—

shall receive a subvention under the provisions of section 2 of this act for a longer period than ten years.

That is the only limitation?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the only limitation.

Mr. SPOONER. So a new vessel constructed would have a ten years' contract.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would have a ten years' contract.

Mr. SPOONER. So this is without limit of time, with that exception?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is indeed, unless Congress chooses to change it.

The Senator from Florida raises the objection that the conditions we have imposed in the bill were makeweights and did not amount to anything. I want to touch briefly on those points. Now, let me see. The first condition is:

That said vessel may be taken and used by the United States, for the national defense or for any public purpose, at any time, upon payment to the owner or owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, or a fair rate of hire to be agreed upon. And if there shall be a disagreement as to such fair actual value or fair rate of hire between the United States and the owner or owners of such vessel, then the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, they to select a third, who shall act in such appraisement in case the two shall fail to agree.

It is objected that this is only a makeweight and means nothing. But while the Government under existing law might impress or confiscate ships in an emergency, there is no specific provision for this.

The statement of the War Department as to the Army's need of merchant steamers as transports in war (and I refer to Document No. 141, p. 8), speaking of the Santiago expedition, says that—

The Quartermaster's Department chartered every American vessel that could be obtained in the Atlantic ports during the twenty days following the declaration of war.

This is the opinion of the board, the technical board of the War Department, transmitted through General Chaffee to the Secretary of War and by the Secretary of War in a communication to the chairman of the late Merchant Marine Commission. He adds:

It has already been shown that this fleet was practically all that could be secured in Atlantic waters except by impressment of American or purchase of foreign ships. Conscription of property as a feature of military policy is only less obnoxious than conscription of men.

Those are the words of the Secretary of War. And the report says further:

This condition can not improve until the American steam seagoing merchant marine has increased in tonnage to approximately two and one-half times its present volume by the addition of ships adapted in size and design to quick conversion into suitable transports and built under conditions which make their voluntary surrender to the United States on demand a foregone conclusion.

Mr. President, that is exactly what this bill provides. This provision above quoted, holding these vessels specifically at the disposal of the Government in war as a condition of the contract, makes "their voluntary surrender to the United States on demand a foregone conclusion."

Shipowners receiving this subvention must bind themselves in their contract to sell or charter their vessels when required.

This is, therefore, a new and real requirement, so far as cargo vessels are concerned. The same requirement is to be found as to contract mail steamers in the postal-aid law of 1891.

In the Spanish war both the Army and Navy required a great many steamers outside of these contract mail liners.

Mr. President, it is in the testimony somewhere, or perhaps in an interview, that Admiral Sampson said if we had met with a single reverse on the ocean during the Spanish-American war we could not possibly have recruited our forces; it would have been an impossible thing, for we had all our available seamen and ships engaged in that little war of a few days.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if he is quite sure that this provision accomplishes what the paper he has just read supposes it does?

Mr. GALLINGER. If it does not, I will gladly welcome an amendment written by the Senator from Colorado that does accomplish it.

Mr. TELLER. I would not like to interfere with the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. We meant to do it. I think the Senator ought to help perfect it.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that this provision on page 8 leaves the question open:

First. That said vessel may be taken and used by the United States, for the national defense or for any public purpose, at any time, upon payment to the owner or owners of the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking, or a fair rate of hire to be agreed upon.

No matter what the emergency is, the Government can not take this until it is paid for. Now, if they can not agree, there is a provision here that you may go into arbitration. It seems to me that when these people accept the subsidy from the Government, they ought to contract with the Government that the Government may take the vessel at any time and adjust the ownership later, because the Government might need it to-morrow, and an arbitration that might take three or four months would render the use of it entirely valueless to the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Considering what the Government paid for foreign vessels during the late emergent condition we were in, I do not think the Government would haggle with American owners so as to compel them to go to an arbitration.

Mr. TELLER. The Government ought not to be in the position that when they go to buy a ship they need to-morrow or next day the owner can say, "Now, you need this so badly I will hold you up." I think the Government ought, under the circumstances, to have the right to take the ship and subsequently settle, either by agreement or by arbitration. Unless that is done, you will find that the Government will experience great embarrassment in dealing with this subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have more confidence in the American people than the Senator from Colorado. I do not believe there will be a bit of difficulty. I think it would be the most extraordinary thing for the Government to confiscate private property.

Mr. TELLER. No; you would not confiscate it.

Mr. GALLINGER. You would come pretty near it.

Mr. ALDRICH. You can not do that.

Mr. TELLER. You can not do that; I understand that; but when these people submit themselves for this subsidy the Government can say to them, as a condition precedent, "You must enter into an agreement that whenever we think the vessel ought to go into our service it shall go into our service; and we guarantee either to pay for it or we shall agree to submit it to arbitration."

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a fair proposition.

Mr. TELLER. That is a fair proposition, which it can not be in this case, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the bill can be amended in that particular——

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the chairman ought to amend it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The chairman will give it consideration. The second condition is:

That said vessel shall carry, free of charge, the mails of the United States, when the Postmaster-General shall so require, for the whole or any part of a voyage for which subvention shall be claimed.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] said that did not amount to anything, but I think it does, because cargo vessels would never be called on to carry mails. That might not happen on the regular mail lines. But the United States is constantly shipping mails now by tramp steamers to distant places where no mail liners run. If all the mail lines proposed in this bill are established, there will still be out of the way ports to which mail must go by tramp or occasional steamers. Such tramp steamers, if American, would receive under existing law for noncontract service $1.60 per pound for letters and 8 cents per pound for other articles. This provision would require these vessels to carry such mails free. For this noncontract mail service the nation paid in 1905 in the Pacific $141,000 to American and $31,000 to foreign vessels, and in the trade with Canada, Mexico, the West Indies, Central and South America, etc., $95,000 to American and $79,000 to foreign vessels. Much of this mail would be taken by new contract lines established under this bill, but not all of it. A considerable quantity of mail now costing some thousands of dollars would go by these cargo steamers free of charge to ports to which no mail liners run.

The third provision is:

That upon each departure of said vessel from the United States at least one-sixth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or men who have declared their intention to become citizens, and of the deck force, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck.

The Senator, I recall, thought that that was simply a meaningless provision. Now, Mr. President, the existing law requires that, except as to mail steamers operating under the law of 1891, only the captain, licensed deck officers, and engineers in charge of a watch shall be American citizens. Barring these officers, the entire crew may be foreigners—Chinese, Lascars, or any other nationality. This requirement that one-sixth of the crew of such vessels shall be citizens of the United States is new and real. It is a provision that does impose upon the vessel owner that hardship as compared with existing law.

If all our present American seamen could be distributed mathematically at all ports of the United States it might be possible to require more than one-sixth American. But it may easily happen that in some ports at some time even one-sixth may be very difficult to obtain, inasmuch as the majority of our deep-water crews are foreigners.

One purpose of this bill is to increase the number of American seamen by increasing the demand for them. After some years it may be possible to require by law a larger American portion. But it is believed that, all things considered, this is as large as it is safe to start with. To require immediately a larger proportion of American seamen than could reasonably be found at any given port would be to embarrass shipowners and check the growth of the merchant marine.

The postal-aid law of 1891 requires that during the first two years of a mail contract one-fourth of the crew of mail steamers shall be American citizens, during the next three years one-third, and thereafter one-half. This, with other requirements of the postal-aid law, is applied to the mail steamers of the present bill in section 5 of this bill, from line 25, on page 10, to line 5, on page 11.

The provision of this bill that "of the deck force, excluding licensed officers, at least one-half shall be able seamen, who are hereby defined to be men who have had two years or more experience at sea on deck" is an entirely new requirement. There is nothing in existing law to prevent a cargo vessel from going to sea with a complete deck crew of greenhorns. That the requirement is for no more than one-half is because the seamen of our future merchant marine should be American boys as far as possible. American boys born and brought up on the coast readily become able seamen in two years, though it doubtless takes many foreigners longer. There are many instances in which American boys from the coast have become, not only able seamen, but second mates of sail craft after two years actual sea experience—having been accustomed to the sea since boyhood. This provision in its practical effect will give American boys from our seacoast population a certain preference in American ships over foreigners.

Fourth. That a vessel employed in the foreign trade shall maintain, during the period so employed, at least class A1 if a steam vessel and at least class A1½ if a sail vessel, as such classes are now established by either the Record of American and Foreign Shipping or the United States Standard Owners, Builders, and Underwriters' Association, or equivalent classification in any other register of shipping of at least equal merit.

A new steam, iron, or steel vessel is generally rated A1 for twenty years, while a wooden sail vessel originally rates A1 usually for twelve years. On reaching an age of twenty-one years the sail vessel, however thoroughly kept up, is dropped arbitrarily into class A1½, a lower rating, though if well maintained, she may be as sound and serviceable as ever, and even, as a matter of fact, is accepted by insurance companies for almost any kind of cargo. Though not of the highest rating, good American-built wooden vessels at twenty years are thoroughly seaworthy and efficient. To require that all sail vessels should be of class A1 would exclude from the benefit of this law a considerable good tonnage. However, there are vessels afloat in home and foreign trade that do not rate even A1½, and such old and uncertain craft as these are excluded from the subvention by the terms of this provision. It is believed that the requirement of A1 for steam vessels and at least A1½ for sail vessels draws the line as fairly as can be drawn between the vessels fit for the subvention and those unfit for it by reason of great age or neglectful treatment. Many sail vessels, very old, but still actively engaged in trade, will be barred out by this A1½ limitation. This provision, therefore, like the others, is a real and positive requirement.

The fifth condition is—

That all ordinary repair or overhauling of said vessel shall be made in the United States, except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within a distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when the repairs shall be desired.

There is no requirement in present law that American vessels, even the steamers of contract mail lines, shall make their ordinary repairs and overhauling in the United States. As a matter of fact, they sometimes repair abroad. Even contract mail steamers of recent years have, in a few instances, done this, employing foreign materials and labor. The purpose of this fifth requirement is to give increased employment to American shipyards, it being considered just that vessels receiving a subvention from the public Treasury should make all ordinary repairs in the United States. All materials required for the repair of American vessels in foreign trade may be imported free of duty.

This provision requiring all ordinary repairs to be made in the United States is again a real requirement, adding somewhat, doubtless, to the cost of operation of American vessels. A steamer has to be thoroughly overhauled at least once a year, often requiring two or four weeks for this purpose, at an expenditure of thousands of dollars. Steamers have to be docked for painting and cleaning at least once a year. It is the practice to dock naval vessels of the United States twice a year, if possible.

The sixth requirement is that—

A vessel shall not be entitled to the subvention above provided for unless during the period of employment in the foreign trade or deep-sea fisheries the following proportions of the crew of the vessel after the dates specified shall have been enrolled in the naval volunteers: After July 1, 1908, one-eighth; after July 1, 1912, one-sixth; after July 1, 1917, one-fourth: Provided, That if the foregoing stated proportions of naval volunteers can not be obtained at a foreign port with reasonable effort, as certified by the consul, other persons may be substituted until the first return of said vessel to the United States, without forfeiture of the subvention.

This requirement as to a naval reserve of officers and men has been criticised by the Senator from Florida as having no proper or necessary place in a bill for the development of the American merchant marine and American commerce.

The President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress of December 17, 1903, recommending the creation of the Merchant Marine Commission, defined the purpose of such a commission to be:

For the purpose of investigating and reporting to the Congress at its next session what legislation is desirable or necessary for the development of the American merchant marine and American commerce, and incidentally of a national ocean mail service of adequate auxiliary naval cruisers and naval reserves.

In his message to the present Congress of December 5, 1905, the President declares that:

To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need to reenforce our battle line.

In these recommendations of the President of the United States, frankly recognizing the close connection between the merchant marine and the Navy, and our need of a trained sea militia, is ample justification for the naval-reserve section of this bill.

Moreover, the Navy Department itself at the last session of Congress caused a bill to be introduced creating a naval reserve of officers and men of the merchant marine. The General Board of the Navy Department, of which Admiral Dewey is president, has approved the naval-reserve section of this bill, most of which, indeed, was drafted in so many words by the General Board, which very much desires the enactment of this measure. More complete sanction by the naval authorities of the naval-reserve provision of this bill could not be asked. It is well known that the naval militia of the several States now existing is composed chiefly of men who do not follow and never have followed the sea as a profession, and that while valuable for harbor defense, these State militia organizations are not fit for immediate ocean service.

The continental nations of Europe have their merchant officers and seamen undergo compulsory service on men-of-war, and the British Government grants retainer bounties to a naval reserve of 33,500 merchant officers and seamen and fishermen.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask one question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the Senator his own opinion and the opinion of the Commission on the question whether the foreign governments who are now giving these special advantages to their ships in order to enable them to get the carrying trade would respond to the legislation of this country intended to give our ships an advantage by giving their ships another advantage. It seems to me that if they gave their ships an advantage to begin with, in order to take the carrying trade from us, and we should now pass a subsidy law intended to take the carrying trade from them, foreign nations would respond to that by increasing their subsidies or advantages.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why should they do it, I will ask the Senator, any more than they should go on increasing duties as against the rates in this country?

Mr. BAILEY. They are increasing duties by way of retaliation, now; and the Senator must know that within the next thirty days it will be practically impossible to export any of our meat products to Germany.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think the United States will be able to take care of itself as against Germany in that regard?

Mr. BAILEY. I am not myself anxious to invite retaliation of that kind, and I asked the question because I was sure the Commission had considered that phase of it, and I desired the benefit of the Commission's conclusion. If bounty is to be met by bounty, the result of it all would be that the shipowners of the world would get more than any reasonable man thinks they are entitled to, and the taxpayers of all countries would be compelled to pay it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that, of course, is in the realm of conjecture. I do not know what foreign nations will do. I know that foreign nations are considerably disturbed over this bill. The London Times is disturbed, and Sir John Herron is disturbed, and a good many other British statesmen are disturbed, because they think we are going to build up a merchant marine under this bill. I do not know what they will do by way of retaliation, and I will not venture to prophesy.

Now, Mr. President, I have held the floor longer than I intended to do, and I will close by a single observation. It is proper that Senators on both sides of the Chamber should criticise the bill. Nobody is going to be sensitive about that.

The Commission over which I had the honor to preside did the best it could and gave its best thought, whether that thought was good or bad, to this question, and they reached certain conclusions. They were all men in the public service. They will be gratified if their labors shall result in something to the benefit of the great subject that was committed without their wish to their charge. It may be sentiment—that word has been used to-day—it may be undue patriotism, but some of us are very much exercised over the present condition of our merchant marine. When three gentlemen testified before the Commission, and their testimony will be found in the printed proceedings, that they had traveled, each of them, three times around the world and never saw the American flag at the masthead of a steamship, saying if they did see it it was on a man-of-war or on a yacht owned by some millionaire of the country, it impressed me that this great nation, which is ahead of all the nations of the world in wealth, in manufacturing, in mining, and in agriculture, ought to do something to reestablish its power and its prestige on the ocean.

And I want to say that, in my opinion, after we have spent two hundred, or three hundred, or four hundred million dollars in building the Panama Canal, it will be a reproach to this great Government if the American flag is not seen on that great waterway; and it will not be seen over American merchant ships unless Congress does something to rehabilitate this great industry.

Mr. President, I am through.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DAM ACROSS ROCK RIVER, ILLINOIS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8442) permitting the building of a dam across the Rock River at Grand Detour, Ill.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Spencer B. Newberry and George A. Blackford, both of the city of Sandusky, Erie County, Ohio, and Charles H. Hughes, of Dixon, Lee County, Ill., their heirs, administrators, successors, and assigns, to build, operate, and maintain a dam across Rock River near Grand Detour, Ill., at any point within 1 mile distant from the center of section 13, township 22 north, range 9 east of the fourth principal meridian, in the State of Illinois, for the development of water power and such works and structures in connection therewith as may be necessary or convenient in the development of said power and in the utilization of the power thereby developed; and the said Spencer B. Newberry, George A. Blackford, and Charles H. Hughes, their heirs, administrators, successors, and assigns, are hereby authorized and empowered to draw and divert by canal, flume, or race from the pool formed by the construction of the above dam and works incident thereto, such supply of water as may be required for the full development and utilization of said water power and to conduct said water through the canal reservation in Grand Detour and discharge the same into said Rock River at or near the westerly end of said canal reservation, and also for that purpose to construct, operate, and maintain such structures and improvements as may be required: Provided, That the plans for the construction of the said dam, canal, and appurtenant works shall be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the commencement of the construction of the same: And provided further, That the said Spencer B. Newberry, George A. Blackford, and Charles H. Hughes, their heirs, administrators, successors, and assigns, shall not deviate from such plans after such approval either before or after the completion of the structures therein described, unless the modification of said plans shall have been previously submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and Secretary of War: And provided further, That suitable fishways shall be constructed and maintained by the grantees under the act at their own expense, as may be required from time to time by the United States Fish Commission: And provided further, That the said dam shall be so constructed that the Government of the United States may at any time construct in connection therewith a suitable lock for navigation purposes, and may at any time control the said dam so far as shall be necessary for the purposes of navigation, but shall not destroy or impair the water power developed by said dam, canal, and appurtenant structures to a greater extent than shall be necessary to provide proper facilities for navigation.

SEC. 2. That in case any litigation arises from the building, operation, and maintenance of said dam, canal, and appurtenant works, or from the obstruction of the river by the same, or any damages resulting to private property by overflow or otherwise, proceedings to adjust, determine, and to recover compensation for such damages shall be instituted either in the State or Federal courts.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless the dam, canal, and appurtenant works herein authorized be commenced within three years and completed within six years from the time of the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. That the right to amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "navigation," on page 3, line 11, the following words: "and other purposes of public interest."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that was introduced by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. HITT], and the report of the engineers states that it would be a great saving to the Government to have the bill passed. It is the ordinary dam bill, reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors unanimously.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I understand this bill has been reported unanimously by the committee; that it was introduced by Mr. HITT, who is ill. I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

On motion of Mr. HEPBURN, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill—Mr. VREELAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That all ventilator cars, refrigerator cars, oil or tank cars, including express company and express cars, and any and all cars which have heretofore been termed "private cars," used in the transportation of any article or commodity of interstate or foreign commerce, are hereby declared to be and are common carriers and subject to all laws, rules, and regulations regulating or affecting common carriers in the transportation of articles or commodities of interstate and foreign commerce.

Provided further, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any railroad company engaged in the business of a common carrier to contract with any person, firm, or corporation, being the producers or shippers of any article or commodity entering into interstate or foreign commerce, for the shipment or transportation of such article or commodity when such article or commodity is offered for shipment or transportation in ventilator cars, refrigerators cars, tank cars, or private cars of any character whatsoever, owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by such producers or shippers. To be a stockholder in, or director or officer of, any company owning or controlling such ventilator cars, refrigerator cars, tank cars, or private cars of whatever character shall be considered as having such an interest as is prohibted by this act.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not intended, Mr. Chairman, by the proviso just read to deny the use of the cars named to the freight traffic of the country. My contention is the carriers should furnish them—not the shipper.

The purpose of the amendment is to guarantee to the small shipper equal rates and like facilities with the large shipper on common carriers.

The purpose is to strike the crux of inequality in rates and facilities, and at the same time to protect the little shipper and the railroads, and thereby the public, from the power and rapacity of the big shipper.

It is not possible to secure equal opportunities for all shippers on common carriers while some are permitted to use their own cars, or cars that are controlled by them, in the place of those furnished by the roads and that are common to all.

I am not unmindful of the claim made by the large shippers that they are entitled to lower rates on common carriers because they are large and provide their own cars, than small shippers who use the cars and facilities provided by the railroad companies; but to concede the justice of such a claim, in the first place, would evidence a shameless disregard of the rights of competitors, and, in the second place, concede the right to create and maintain monopoly in products of industry.

Why, sir, a common carrier is not a common carrier when the facilities upon it are not common to all at equal rates.

In England, at the time of the origin of railways, the road was regarded as a turnpike, and shippers and others using it furnished their own equipment, paying tolls. This plan soon proved impractical, and the railways furnished and controlled all the facilities. In this country it was early recognized as the duty of the road to furnish suitable equipment, including cars in which to do the business of a common carrier, serving the whole public alike.

Indeed, the railways of this country are chartered as common carriers to undertake to provide a way—a common way, if you please—and facilities that are common to all, for the transportation of the traffic offered by the public.

I doubt, sir, the legal right of a common carrier, under its charter, to permit the use of a private facility in the transportation of any commodity, in this country.

The shipper who uses his own cars, or cars that are controlled by him, has an unlawful and unfair advantage over his less fortunate competitor who uses the cars or facilities provided by the carrier. The use of private cars by large shippers has enabled them to crowd out their smaller competitors. The right of fair competition, the necessity to prevent the creation and maintenance of monopoly, make it necessary that common carriers shall offer no advantages, either by facilities or by rates, to one shipper over another. [Applause.]

A due regard for the public welfare demands the maintenance in the United States of the law of competition unmodified, unobstructed, and inviolate. The irresistible result and the logical effect of conceding to large shippers the right to use their own facilities is the creation of monopoly, which is always dangerous to the public welfare. The rights of the public to a competitive market in which to sell and in which to buy are of first and last importance, and these rights are not secure where one producer has an advantage over another on the way to market.

Is there a doubt about this? Does the use of private facilities by shippers give such shippers advantage over competitors in reaching the markets of the country? Does their use result in the creation of monopoly? The mere mention of two industries shows that the use of private facilities, or private cars on common carriers, has resulted in the creation of monopolies which control the business to-day in which these concerns are engaged. I refer to the beef combine and the Standard Oil monopoly.

These enterprises started like many others of the same kind engaged in a similar business. They were not content, however, with the growth of their business in a fair competitive field, embracing the opportunities and sharing the profits that were common to all and open to all. They first demanded and secretly received lower freight rates than their competitors. This enabled them to make larger profits and to grow faster than those with whom they were competing. They got big. They acquired power not over their competitors alone, but over the railroads, and through them over the public. They did not hesitate to exercise their acquired power in securing other advantages over their rivals and over the railroads they had so artfully used in the creation of their greatness and their power. They became large enough and strong enough to provide themselves with their own facilities—their own cars. They offered their products for shipment in these cars to the railroads, not at the rates fixed by the roads for all shippers of like products, but at rates fixed by themselves, which they demanded and which the railroads had to consent to. This exercise of a power unlawfully acquired has made them masters to-day of the railroads of the country and has enabled them to fix the price of the raw materials they buy and of the finished product they sell, and thus to hold the public in their grasp. Why, sir, it has enabled them to fix the price of transportation, of raw material and finished products, and to take in at their own price or crush out at their own will those who would compete with them for the business in which they are engaged.

I would not go beyond the limits of a proper discussion of the pending question, but I have thought, Mr. Chairman, that a discussion of this measure would be incomplete without reference to these concerns.

The beef combine and the Standard Oil monopoly are so related to the common carriers of the country and the welfare of the public that I lay stress upon the fact that these concerns have had much to do with fixing the prices of the necessities of life by disturbing the equality and uniformity of freight rates to the destruction of competition and the creation of powerful and dangerous monopolies.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a portion of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to private cars, for the year 1903, beginning at the second paragraph on page 23 of that report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under conditions which have long prevailed, and for reasons that need not be more particularly stated, the owners of these private cars have had special advantages through their control of an immense tonnage of competitive freight and the vehicles in which it was carried.

Not only could they select the line or lines to be favored, but they were able to, and did, in great measure, dictate the rates to be paid for the carriage of their commodities.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I now send to the Clerk's desk the Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1904, and ask to have read the second paragraph on page 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

Some of the evils attending the use of private cars are as follows:

(1) Concessions are made to particular shippers in refrigeration charges which amount to the payment of a rebate.

(2) A practical monopoly has been created in the use of private cars for the movement of certain commodities, which has enormously increased to the public the cost of transportation.

(3) When the owner of the car becomes a dealer in the commodity transported, the fact of ownership gives him an important advantage over his competitor.

(4) When the owner of the car is also the owner of the commodity transported, an excessive rental for the car may amount to a preference in the freight rate as against the shipper who does not own his car.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have stated that these two great monopolies exercise an influence and power over the transportation companies of the country. I now say, without fear of successful disputation, that the power they exercise is greater and vastly more oppressive than the power the Government seeks to exercise over them. A power, sir, which has been exercised, I repeat again, to the demoralization of the freight schedules not only of the commodities which these concerns produce, but of many that enter into the daily use of the people.

These monopolies are as merciless to the railroads as they are to their competitors, and their injustice in this is at last visited upon the public. Mr. J. W. Midgely, a freight commissioner of many railroads, gave evidence of the control that these gigantic concerns have over the transportation lines of the country. Testifying before the Interstate Commerce Commission in Chicago in 1904, he said:

The packers are probably the largest shippers in the world, having the shipments and also the vehicles in which they insist their freight shall be shipped. They compel quick performance and the return promptly of the empty cars. They are not permitted to be detained for the purpose of loading them back, because they get the same mileage whether the car is loaded or empty. There is no inducement for them to let the car be held to be loaded back.

Again, he says:

If any road dares to disobey their orders when they impose a requirement, they will not get any more of their traffic. The boycott can not be visited more effectively upon the railways. That is the secret of the whole situation. They are the largest shippers, the most arbitrary, the most remorseless that have ever been known.

Testifying further, he says:

The rate was reduced to half a cent per car per mile on all freight equipment, including refrigerator cars and tank cars, at a meeting over which I presided. I think there were some sixty railroads represented in St. Louis in 1892 or 1894. The private car owners demanded a hearing. We gave them a hearing, but paid no further attention to them. We stated that we wanted to drive their cars out. At that time the Standard Oil people came to me and said we were going a little too fast. They thought we better not undertake to reduce the rate on their tank cars without a conference. I consented, and a conference was held in the Standard Oil Company's office in New York with those people.

Mr. W. H. Tilford made this remark to me at the time of the meeting. He said: "I never saw a combine but what there was a weak sister among the number. I will single out the weakest company that can be found and put all our shipments to the twin cities and to the Missouri River on that line, provided they will give us three-fourths of a cent per mile for our tank cars, loaded or empty." Mr. Midgely says we thought we could do something, and one of our party, who recently died, Mr. Chappell, said the railroads are large purchasers of oil and we can buy our oil elsewhere. Mr. Tilford said: "You will, will you? Do it; we have all the oil in the country," and he said: "Good day, gentlemen." I went out on the street and met Mr. A. B. Stickney, president of the Chicago Great Western road, and told him of the interview. He was a party to our agreement. His line had never carried a car of oil before that time for the Standard Oil Company. He went right up there and made a contract allowing them three-quarters of a cent for their tank cars, and then gave me notice. The other lines didn't get one carload to St. Paul, Minneapolis, or the Missouri River. It made a great hole in their earnings and they called for another meeting. They said we must make peace with the Standard Oil people.

Mr. Midgely called another meeting so the railroads could make terms with the Standard Oil Company and the beef combine, over which he presided, and says:

We met the Standard Oil Company with the trunk line representatives in New York. I was chairman of that conference, and there we compromised on the rate of 6 mills per car per mile, including stock cars and railroad cars, but excepted refrigerator cars and excepted the Standard Oil cars, because the trunk lines said: "We have never been able to stand up against it."

Mr. Chairman, the railroads were able to fix rates for the use of all equipment except those of the Standard Oil monopoly and the beef combine, and admitted their inability to control rates on their roads against the will of these concerns.

Now, the rate-making power in contested cases ought to be as safe to the railroads in the hands of the Government, that is impartial, as in the hands of these powerful monopolies that have an interest to serve.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Government does not seek to exercise such power over the transportation companies of the country as has been exercised over them by these giant monopolies.

The Government, I think, would not assume a management or control over railroad companies to the extent of exercising the right and the power of discharging employees, changing time schedules, and giving orders for the prompt return of cars, and yet, sir, these large shippers, according to the testimony of Mr. Midgely, arrogate to themselves the exercise of that authority and of that power in addition to the rate-making power.

Mr. Midgely, in answer to a question as to his knowledge of the facts related in his testimony, said:

Yes, sir; nobody else knows them since the death of Mr. Fink to the extent I do. I am not giving away any railroad or compromising any railroad, and nobody can hit me, since I am a joint representative. They can hit anyone identified with a single railroad; therefore a man that has a distinct identification can not speak. He would lose his position, I do not care what his rank.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I unhesitatingly say that if the individual representatives or managers of railroad companies dared to speak their sentiments and exercise their authority, they would rid themselves of the power that has so insidiously crept upon them and that masters them to-day to the injury of the whole public.

Mr. A. B. Stickney, president of the Great Western Railroad Company, is credited with saying:

In fixing the rate on dressed meat we don't have very much to say. The packer generally makes the rate. He comes to you and always makes you feel that he is your friend. Then he asks how much you charge for a certain shipment of dressed meats. The published tariff may be 23 cents a hundred, but he will not pay that. You say to him: "I'll carry your meat for 18 cents." He says, "Oh, no; you won't. I won't pay that." Then you say, "Well, what will you pay for it?" He then replies, "I can get it hauled for 16 cents." So you haul it for 16 cents a hundred.

There is no small shipper in the land who could be so independent or who could command and receive so much.

Mr. E. P. Ripley, president of the Sante Fe Railway Company, is credited also with saying what I now read:

The packing-house business to-day is concentrated in so few hands that this fact, together with the keen competition between the railroads, practically makes it possible for the latter to dictate rates for dressed beef and packing-house products.

Mr. Midgely, who in all probability knows as much of this subject as he claims to know, says:

The railroad companies want reform. Yes; they want it to-day. And they seem to think the private car lines stand in their way.

The power exercised by these large shippers over the railroads of the country is not confined to the products shipped by these concerns, but extends to many other products over which they exercise control through the use of their cars. Shipments in the fruit business, the poultry business, the dairy business, the brewing business, are all largely under the control of these concerns through the influence they exercise by forcing their private cars on the common carriers of the country in the shipment of these products. No railroad can declare its independence of them. None even dares to try such a thing, though many millions of dollars' worth of cars owned by the railroad companies are side tracked while the roads are forced to pay exorbitant mileage charges for the use of the private cars of these shippers, which, of course, in the end, becomes a charge upon the public.

The profit of these great concerns from mileage on their private cars used largely in the shipment of their own products, at freight rates named by themselves and often upon time schedules fixed by themselves, to which the railroads have had to conform, is enormous, and is a tax upon the freight traffic of the country.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, referring to this, says:

The practice is one which yearly saps the revenue of the railroad companies, while forcing their own equipment to stand idle, burdens such companies with the maintenance of the private cars while on their lines. Some idea of the magnitude of the amounts paid by railroad companies for the use of private cars may be gathered from the figures as shown by the report of the seventeenth annual convention of car accountants in 1892, wherein it is stated that at the rate of three-quarters of a cent per mile they earned during the year 1890 over $30,666,000 in mileage, while the total cost of the 70,000 private cars in use was about $91,000,000. At this ratio the cars would pay for themselves in about three years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this rate of earnings applied to the 162,687 private cars now in use would aggregate $71,250,000 for last year on an estimated investment of $150,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the railroads must pay the wages of their employees, keep up their equipment, their roadbed, pay their taxes and dividends to their stockholders, and the freight traffic of the small shipper is the only class of freight over which they exercise control out of which to raise these necessary expenses.

Why, sir, the railroads of the country are not powerful enough, unaided by the Government, to make rates for the beef combine and the Standard Oil Company, and while they are permitted to use their own cars there will be demoralization and inequality in freight rates.

But that is not all. They hesitate at nothing, sir. The press dispatches this morning contain the following:

WORK STOPPED IN MISSOURI.

KANSAS CITY, MO., January 30.

Several oil producers from Indian Territory and Kansas met here to-day to discuss the question of a market for their product.

H. L. Woods, of the Oil City Derrick, who is in the city, said:

"I understand that as the Standard Oil Company has ordered work stopped in Missouri on its Whiting pipe line the producers see their chance of a market slipping away from them. The agitation against the Standard in Missouri is hurting the oil business in the Territory and Kansas. I think the producers will send a committee to Governor Folk and Attorney-General Hadley to ascertain, if possible, what are the prospects of a cessation of hostilities."

Ye gods! Has it come to this, that the power of monopoly can be used to stop the prosecution of suits pending in the courts by threatening innocent producers of a great commodity entering into the commerce of the country with destruction? They ask the protection of their property, yet they would destroy millions of dollars worth belonging to an innocent public to stop a suit pending in the courts against them.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman. The Armour and the Rockefeller interests are imposing themselves further upon the railroads by becoming officers and directors in many of them, so that to-day, when these great concerns go to a railroad company to make a contract for the transportation of their products they contract with themselves.

The effect of this upon the country is injurious beyond conjecture. During the time of a long struggle between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Standard Oil Company, over the question as to which should exercise the rate-making power on the Pennsylvania system—a struggle in which the Standard Oil Company was finally successful—the railroad company undertook the refining business as a war measure. John D. Rockefeller said to the railroad officers that it was not a fair fight; that if a transportation company went into the refining business it could not be expected to deal fairly with its rivals. Mr. Flagler, of the Standard company, testifying before a committee of Congress, said that the Standard company could not get into the markets with its products over the Pennsylvania Railroad, because that company was favoring its own refinery to the injury of the Standard. Rockefeller and his agent, Mr. Flagler, were right then, and what they said at that time is as true now. The Standard monopoly controls and fixes the rates on oil to-day on the railroads of the country as fully as if it owned them, through the exercise of every power it possesses, including its private tank-car lines, and its rivals have no chance. What is true of Armour on meat rates is true of Rockefeller on oil rates.

Does the Standard monopoly control the rates on oil? Let the rates answer. Under a maximum rate law passed by the State of Kansas, the fairness of which has not been contested, oil is now shipped from Chanute, Kans., to Kansas City, Kans., a distance of 123 miles, for 7 cents per hundred. The rate from Chanute to Kansas City, Mo., 126 miles—3 miles farther, on the same roads, without change—is 17 cents per hundred.

The Standard oil monopoly has a refinery on Sugar Creek, at Kansas City, Mo., and, by reason of this difference in freight rates, is able to control the refined oil trade in Kansas City, Mo., and its suburbs on the Missouri side of the line.

The freight rate from Chanute, Kans., to Weber, Kans., a distance of 254 miles, is 10½ cents per hundred pounds. The freight rate from Chanute, Kans., to Superior, Nebr., on the same line of railroad as Weber, and 7 miles farther, is 30 cents per hundred pounds. The increase of 7 miles in the distance increases the freight rate almost three times.

The rate on oil and its by-products from Chanute, Kans., to Coolidge, Kans., a distance of 485 miles, is 15 cents per hundred pounds. The rate to Holly, Colo., 491 miles from Chanute, is 50 cents per hundred pounds. In this instance an increase in the distance of 6 miles nearly quadruples the freight rate, and both rates are over the same line of railway.

These comparisons could be continued indefinitely, and they tell their own story.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On what roads are these rates made?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rates are the same on all the railroads to the points I have named. There are four railroads from the oil fields into Kansas City, Mo., and I understand the rates are uniform on all four.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do you claim, then, that on each of these railroads there is a direct, open discrimination against the Kansas shipper?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Absolutely to the extent that he can not at reasonable rates send his oil outside of the State of Kansas, and it is either done voluntarily by the railways or they are forced to do it. One of the two propositions is true, and I would have difficulty in convincing myself that the management of any railroad company would fix prohibitive rates upon any commodity in general use upon its lines if it had control of fixing the rate in that commodity.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I should be very glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How have you obtained this information which you are giving to the House in regard to rates?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. From shippers who have applied for rates.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Have these shippers come out in the open and made these statements or have they made them to you privately?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say to the gentleman from New York that complaint has been made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the matter is now pending there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then, what you are saying is a matter of common knowledge in your district?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why, certainly; at least to those who are interested in shipping oil out of the State.

I repeat, either the roads were forced to put the rates up by the Standard, or they volunteered to do so to avoid carrying oil beyond the borders of Kansas, a wholly impossible supposition.

And yet this great monopoly proclaims its innocence of obtaining by any method an unfair advantage over either its competitors, the producers of crude oil, or the consumers of the finished product.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman, I quote, on page 47 and following pages, from testimony in the investigation of the secretary of internal affairs of the State of Pennsylvania, and from pages 160 and 204 and 207 and the following pages, in the case of Pennsylvania v. The Pennsylvania Railroad. In an interview of an independent oil producer with the third vice-president and traffic manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the producer said: "If we should ship as much [referring to the Standard] will you give us as low freight rates?" The traffic manager: "No." The producer: "We have been shipping over the Pennsylvania Railroad, and why can we not continue?" The traffic manager: "It would make them [the Standard] mad. I think you ought to fix it up with them."

Being unable to get a satisfactory rate from the traffic manager, the independent producers applied to the president of the road, and his reply was: "You had better go and arrange with the Standard Oil Company. I do not want to get into any trouble with them. I will do all in my power to bring it about." The producers: "If we ship the same amount of oil, can we have the same rate?" The president: "No." The producer: "If you have not cars enough, will you, if we build cars, haul them?" The president: "No. You will not have any peace or prosperity until you make terms with the company." The president of the Pennsylvania Railroad then offered his services to the independent producers to intercede with the Standard Oil Company to get transportation over his own road for his own customers.

In Pennsylvania v. The Pennsylvania Railroad, pages 725 and 726, the third vice-president and traffic manager of that road testified:

I stated to the outside refiners that we would make lower rates to the Standard Oil Company than to anyone else. We declined to let them have cars of their own on the road.

His evidence covers 76 pages, and in that he verifies, in toto, the interview with himself and with the president of the road that I have just quoted, and yet the officers of the Standard Oil Company declare that they have never had rates or privileges that have not been open and equal to all their competitors.

The Hepburn report to the New York assembly shows in one case where the rate to the independent refiners was $1.15 and the rate to the Standard Oil Company was 38 cents, and in another instance where the rate to independents was $1.40 per barrel on crude oil and to the Standard Oil Company the rate was 88½ cents.

An officer of the Standard Oil Company, in the case of Pennsylvania v. The Pennsylvania Railroad, testified:

Q. Were you allowed a rebate amounting to 64½ cents per barrel?—A. No, sir.

Being compelled to produce the books of the company, he was compelled to read from the books that there was a rebate of 64½ cents per barrel.

But the business ability of the Standard Oil Company has not been confined to such trifling matters as forcing favorable freight rates. The testimony of the Hepburn report to the New York assembly, and in the case of Pennsylvania v. The Pennsylvania Railroad, shows that the Standard Oil Company in one year, through the device of a mistletoe company, demanded and received from three trunk lines of railway over $3,000,000. The money was forcibly taken from the railroads by collecting 22½ cents per barrel on all oil received and transported over the roads referred to. The traffic manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad testified, on page 691, Pennsylvania v. The Pennsylvania Railroad, as follows:

Q. This 22½ cents per barrel paid to the American Transfer Company—

The tool of the Standard Oil—is not restricted to oil passed through their lines?—A. No, sir; it is paid on all oil received and transported by the roads.

A license to steal could add nothing to such sagacity and business ability. They would not play false, and yet would wrongly win.

Homer declares Autolycus was excellent above all men in theft and perjury. Homer returned altogether too early to the skies. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, does it not seem natural that the people of the country should protest against practices and policies that lead to such inequalities as I have detailed? The limited time that I have to occupy the attention of the House this morning has made it impossible for me but to refer briefly to a few of the many conditions of injustice that have been practiced by these powerful concerns against their weaker competitors and against the public welfare.

No, Mr. Chairman; it is not strange that upon every hand, throughout every section of the country, a prosperous people, who believe in equal and exact justice, are everywhere engaged in an effort to give every man and every dollar an equal chance with every other man and every other dollar in the race of life. The country's demand is a fair show, whether a man has small capital or large. It is not hoped, even with an equal chance, that limited capital will enjoy the advantages of unlimited capital, or that a man with little business capacity may succeed as well as a man with great business capacity, but it is hoped that we may be able to make the big fellow stop taking unwarranted and unlawful advantage of the little fellow. This is the fair play and the square deal that the American people demand.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no fight on wealth or corporate capital. On the contrary, the demand is for a square deal for all men and all capital, great and small. The fight is centered against the indefensible methods in business practiced by the large concerns, such as the Standard Oil Company and the beef combine, and is a protest against every method and every practice of common carriers that would deprive anyone of his constitutional rights to a fair chance and an equal opportunity in the pursuit of happiness.

The whole country insists that the highways shall be open to all on equal terms, and that these highways shall be protected against the spoliation of the bandit and the highwayman of trade and commerce for the common good of all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the answer made by those who are charged with these abuses is that they who complain are Populists or dangerous agitators, and if one seeks a remedy for wrongs already done, or a preventive against further injustice to the public, he is denounced as an ambitious demagogue.

Neither is true. The great body of the American people make intelligent protest against a disregard of their rights by those whose duty it is, under public franchises, to deal impartially and fairly with all the people. It is arrogantly charged that the poor envy the rich and covet the power of wealth.

It is not true.

The people have proper regard for those who have wealth and possess its power without ostentation or arrogance, and use it without wanton disregard of the rights of others, and there are many who have wealth and manage its power so that they do unto others as they would that others should do unto them; but there are those who use their power as the highwayman uses his, and it is against the methods of these few that the people seek to protect themselves, and it is for these they have a just contempt.

Why, sir, the captain of industry who so uses his skill and manages the capital under his control as to bring honest returns to honest investors is sought for on every hand and in every field of enterprise. The protest is against the Captain Kidd of industry who would reap where he has not sown; who would gather in where he has not scattered abroad.

We must have wealth and large accumulations of capital to meet the conditions under which we live to-day. An evolution of economic conditions that has been at work for more than half a century has made necessary the creation and incorporation of great enterprises with large capital.

Within the memory of many Members upon this floor, the candle mold, the cobbler's kit, the smokehouse, the loom, the freight wagon, and the stagecoach were the means of production and distribution that ministered to the necessities of the people. These crude implements cost but little, and property in them was within the reach of all. Few were dependent upon others for the little they had of the necessities of life. In three score years the increasing desire of a great people for better things has brought about an evolution in these means until to-day the candle molds, the cobbler's kit, the loom, the smokehouse, the freight wagon, and the stagecoach are almost forgotten. The refinery, the great factory, the large mill, the larger packing house, the fast freight, and the transcontinental limited have taken their place. The people have brought on this change, and it is here to stay.

Now, it took but little capital to start a set of candle molds, a cobbler's kit, a loom, a smokehouse, a freight wagon, or a stagecoach, but it takes large accumulations of capital to start a refinery, a factory, a mill, a packing house, the fast freight, and the limited train.

We must have wealth and large accumulations of capital to maintain these necessities of the life we are living to-day, and there is no fear of such wealth or such capital or the power they wield in the hands of honest men. The fear that justly alarms the people is of the dishonest management of large concerns that make or distribute the necessities of life.

Have the fears of the people been justly alarmed? Are they unthinking Populists? Have the platform, the pulpit, and the press all gone mad? No, no, Mr. Chairman, the people are dependent upon these large concerns to make and bring to them the necessities of life—the light they use, the shoes and clothes they wear, the food they eat, and the fuel they burn. There is, therefore, just cause for complaint when refiners, mills, factories, and packers combine to create monopolies that keep down the price of raw materials to the producers and raise the price of the finished products to the consumers, and to drive the man of small means who would do an independent competitive business to the wall.

Why, on yesterday, in the conservative East, in the staid old State of New Jersey, a Senator offered a resolution. When I read it this morning I said certainly this is a "bronco statesman" from the West. He does not belong to the conservative East; he is from Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, South Dakota, or Arkansas, or Texas; he does not live in New Jersey. But he offered the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read. The resolution is worth listening to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears from testimony of witnesses produced in New York City, in the case of The State of Missouri v. The Standard Oil Company, that the iniquities and evils incident to this greatest of all trusts are due to the laxity of the corporation laws of this State, under the provisions of which the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey was organized, and that the laws of the different States and the United States are habitually violated by its agents and subsidiary corporations to the subversion of popular rights and the lasting disgrace of our State: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate of the State of New Jersey (the house of assembly concurring), That the attorney-general be, and is hereby, directed to institute legal proceedings in the name of the State against the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and its subsidiary corporations in the State for the purpose of annulling and forfeiting the charter of such company, upon the ground of the violation of the common law relating to monopolies and of the Elkins law and laws relative to interstate commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, we could not do more than that out in Kansas. That is quite as radical as the amendment that I have offered here this morning as a preventive against the further growth and power of the very monopoly referred to in that resolution, and it is only radical in that it is effective. There must have been sadness down in Florida this morning while Rockefeller was taking his walk thinking of what he saw in the morning papers. It is easy to see him extend an imploring hand toward old New Jersey and to hear him say "Et tu, Brute," [laughter] and to-morrow as Antony Rodgers leans over the prostrate form and picks out that particular wound he will say, "And this was the most unkindest cut of all." [Laughter.] I extend greetings and congratulations to New Jersey.

Now, certain captains of industry complain because of their arraignment by the people. If any have been made the subject of philippics from the platform and denunciation through the press, it is because of their abuse of power and their failure to comprehend their responsibilities to the public.

Those who smart under public criticism and censure have been so long accustomed to the exercise of power without restraint that they have assumed for themselves a greatness that the ancients hardly conceded to their gods. They have had a contempt for the public, for the law, and for the courts. They have sneered at the complaint of the people, ignored the mandates of the law, and despised the orders of the courts. When the courts would serve them with process, they hide like fugitives from justice. When the officers reach them with subpœnas, they contemptuously answer that it is immaterial to them what the courts expect of them.

They have regard only for money, for wealth, and for its power. Manhood, virtue, honor, love of country, respect for the opinions of the people, regard for the dignity of law and the authority of courts are all to them inferior to the power of the wealth they possess and manage.

It has been said of them that they have made their accumulations by class legislation. The charge is not true, and has never been true. They have filched from the public, producers and consumers, not by sanction of the law, but in spite of it. Indictments and prosecutions of these individuals under old laws in the courts of every part of the land for the methods they have pursued in accumulating their wealth briefly tell the story of the crimes they have committed against the public, the commerce of the country, and the laws of the land, and their defense that the statute of limitations has run or that they committed the acts before the laws were passed, or that they admitted their guilt under implied promises of immunity from prosecution, as they are doing to-day in Chicago, make them neither honest nor innocent men, nor acquits them before the bar of a just public. They despise the crowd, but ask its confidence; they have contempt for the courts, but seek their protection; they ignore the law, but come to it for redress. They might well soliloquize with Macbeth:

> In these cases we shall have judgment here; that we but teach bloody instructions, which being taught, return to plague the inventor. This even-handed justice commends the ingredients of our poisoned chalice to our own lips.

Mr. Chairman, the great problem of to-day is the protection of individual rights and opportunities with every possible safeguard against monopoly. The preservation of the man is the important duty of the time. The socialism that would make atoms of us all is to be resisted whether it be the socialism of the theorist or the monopolist.

It is a great problem; but the solution of great problems has been an important duty in every generation of our country's history. The declaration and maintenance of independence, the formation and adoption of a Constitution, the acquisition and annexation of contiguous territory, the preservation of the Union and the abolition of slavery, provision for sufficient revenue and the establishment of sound finance are among the great problems that we have solved in the past.

Our ancestors left to us institutions made noble by a patriotism that extends to all the blessings of freedom, equality before the law, and a guaranty of like opportunities in the pursuit of happiness.

Secured by these blessings and embracing those opportunities, we have become a happy, prosperous, powerful people, even beyond the dreams of the fathers.

It now remains for us to perform a like duty for our posterity, and leave to them the heritage that was left to us, with freedom secure, equality before the law maintained, and opportunities for the pursuit of happiness guaranteed to all. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2012. An act granting an increase of pension to William Wilson; and

H. R. 12314. An act to amend an act approved February 7, 1905, authorizing the construction of a bridge across Red River at Shreveport, La.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to consume to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], a member of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, coming to the discussion of this minority-majority measure, or which might properly be called this "Democratic-Republican bill," proposed in answer to the demands made by the people of the United States for a number of years, I shall not make any apology to the House nor any apology to my constituents because I have seen fit to advocate its passage. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I congratulate the House that it is the result of the joint and unanimous action of both the minority and the majority Members upon that committee.

For uniting with the majority in reporting and advocating this bill I offer no explanation other than it is my duty as a Representative to represent the people as well as my party. I believe that that man serves his party best who serves the people and his country best [applause]; and therefore, though I am a partisan Democrat, though after the strictest sect of my party I have lived a Democrat, I can and do welcome the opportunity that is afforded in this great House of Representatives by the report made upon this bill for the country, and everyone who shall deal with it hereafter when it shall have passed through this House, to understand that for once the American House of Representatives is almost unanimous in answering the demand of the people of the United States for relief from unjust and unreasonable exactions at the hands of the railroads.

Therefore, though the bill is not in all respects such as I and my party colleagues upon the committee would have had it, though there might be some additions made to it which we thought would improve the situation of interstate transportation, yet when the majority of the committee accepted the proposition contained in the minority bill, introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAVEY], to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix reasonable and just rates as the maximum to be charged beyond which the railroads could not go, instead of as proposed first in the bill offered by the chairman of this committee and by others, and recommended by the President, to authorize and direct that the Commission should fix "a maximum" reasonable rate. Having conceded that, the central figure of this great legislation around which all the others, in my judgment, revolve, and by which they are controlled, we thought it to be our duty to meet halfway the gentlemen on the other side, the Republican members of that committee, and to undertake to give to the people substantial relief by this legislation. We have done so, in my judgment, if this bill shall become a law. What has been the trouble? The trouble has been that since the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the one hundred and sixty-seventh, followed on down by the case in the one hundred and sixty-eighth, the first know as the "Maximum Rate cases" and the other as the "Alabama Midland case," the railroad commission has been stripped of the power with which it was thought to be clothed.

I do not undertake to say or to intimate that in the discussion which resulted in the adoption of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887 that the legislative mind had in its intent to clothe the Commission with this power, but I do say this, that in construing that power up to 1897 the Commission itself exercised the power to make a rate for the future and the railroads obeyed them for ten years. I do say further that the Supreme Court of the United States in the one hundred and sixty-eighth finally declared that no such power was supposed to have been conferred upon the Interstate Commission, from which there was dissent by one of its most learned, most able judges, a man who, in my opinion, stands preeminent in the judicial history of that great court as a man who has ever stood firm for the rights of the people under the Constitution as the fathers intended it to be—I refer to Justice Harlan. [Applause.] Take his decisions on all these great questions which have arisen. The rights of the State, the denial of the right of this Government to hold colonies, the denial of the rights of all persons beneath the flag of our country to the rights of American citizens, the right of the Government to impose and collect an income tax—on all these great questions which have entered into the judicial history of the country there has presided upon that bench one judge, at least, who at all times has endeavored to enforce legislation enacted for the benefit of the people, and who has been guided alone by the great principles of government in the Constitution of the United States, and he has followed and upheld them. [Applause.]

In dissenting from the opinion of the court in the case of The Commission v. The Alabama Midland Railroad, 168 United States Reports, 144, he said:

> Taken in connection with the other decisions defining the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission the present decision goes far to make that Commission a useless body, for all practical purposes, and to defeat many of the important objects designed to be accomplished by the various enactments of Congress relating to interstate commerce. The Commission was established to protect the public against the improper practices of transportation companies engaged in commerce among the several States. It has been left, it is true, with power to make reports and issue protests, but it has been shorn by judicial interpretation of authority to do anything of an effective character. It is denied many of the powers which, in my judgment, were intended to be conferred upon it.

So that it may be safely asserted that the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix charges and compel the railroads to observe them was not drawn into question until the case of the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railroad Company, first in 162 United States and next in 167 United States, and finally these two cases were affirmed in 168 United States Reports, 144, in the case of The Commission v. The Alabama Midland Railroad, which held:

> Congress has not conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum, minimum, or absolute, and it did not intend to secure the same result indirectly by empowering that tribunal, after having determined what, in reference to the past, were reasonable and just rates, to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad companies should follow the rates thus determined to have been in the past reasonable and just.

Thus, by this last decision in 168 United States Reports, not only was it decided that the Commission had no right, after investigation, to say what a reasonable rate was, and to fix it, but that they could not resort to the courts for the purpose of compelling the railroads to observe what was found to be a reasonable rate. So that now, under the law, the Interstate Commerce Commission can neither fix a reasonable rate themselves nor apply to the courts to compel the railroads to charge a reasonable rate or desist from charging an unreasonable rate. The only remedy left to the shipper or person injured is to sue in the courts for damages or for the excessive charge.

I do not mean to disparage any other judge or that court in the least. I do not mean to disparage the decisions of the highest court in the world, for it is the greatest and highest court in the world because it is the highest and greatest court of the greatest people in the world. Therefore I say that I bow to that decision as being the law of the land, not cheerfully sometimes, but willingly. Now, this decision to which I am referring says that the legislative body, whether they did intend to do so or not, by the act of 1887 have not conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to substitute a reasonable rate in place of one found by them to be unreasonable. And I will insert that statement in my remarks. However, Judge Harlan was but one judge out of nine. Stripped, as he said, by the Supreme Court of this power, the Commission became as nothing. After that it had no power. It could recommend, it could appeal to the court; and after varying and various vicissitudes, after wearying of flesh and patience and loss of money in the pursuit of the railroads to the railroad commission, after all that, nothing has been accomplished. So the people all over the country, the shippers and the consumers, those who shipped freight and those who received it, but at last the consumer, received no actual benefit.

The consumer, Mr. Chairman, is the man who pays the freight. In the selling of produce that has been transported either to the consumer at home or abroad, the man who uses it pays the freight, and the man that raises the produce, the cotton, and the corn and the wheat, and all of these great agricultural and manufactured products of this great nation also pays the freight, and not the man who sells them.

In all parts of the country we have seen the question agitated in the various States, and have seen the demand to have enacted State legislation with reference to interstate rates. Long and stubborn have been some of these battles fought by the champions of the people's cause. We know what it has accomplished in many States—fully twenty now regulate freight rates by commissions. We know that whenever the issue has been made before the people the people have triumphed, and the State legislatures have responded to this great demand of the people of the States. In my own State there is being conducted this year a political campaign in order to relieve the people there from excessive rates, although we have our railroad commission, and one which I will refer to in a few moments—one which has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States; one which has its powers delegated to it by the statute.

We are suffering in Georgia, as the country elsewhere is or has been suffering, with extravagant railroad rates, and the people in that State, as they have in other parts of the country, answering these demands made by the people everywhere, will, in my judgment, in this auspicious year rise up and take charge of their business and control and regulate the transportation within its own borders by electing its railroad commissioners by the people. [Applause.]

Why, my State demanded this as far back as 1869, and in 1902 the present governor was elected upon a platform which demanded that this Congress should regulate interstate rates upon interstate shipments. The Democratic convention of Georgia, held on the 2d day of July, 1902, voiced the demands of the assembled Democracy of that State, and recommended "such national legislation as will confer upon the Interstate Commission power to make just and reasonable railroad rates and charges on interstate shipments."

Now, when stripped of its power by the Supreme Court, the Interstate Commerce Commission can no longer protect the people. Sheltered and protected by the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution the railroad magnates and corporations fly to it for protection against the laws of the State, and when the people demand that the Congress shall control and regulate interstate rates we are met by the assertion that Congress has no authority to enact legislation that will control these great interstate railroad lines, because it is an interference with private property and an invasion of States rights. We are told that this Congress has no power under the Constitution to lay its unhallowed hands upon the sacred right of a corporation engaged in the transportation business to rob and plunder the people. For myself, I am not ready to accept that conclusion, a conclusion chiefly advocated and asserted by many of the great metropolitan papers of the country, and chiefly by the lawyers of these great corporations, with the fees of the railroads in their pockets; some of them are gentlemen who stand high in the estimation, and justly so, of the people of the United States; I dissent even though some of them may have been at some time connected with the administration of this Government as Cabinet officers.

So that we come down to the proposition whether Congress, in the exercise of the great sovereign power, of itself has the power and the right to control interstate commerce to the extent of fixing and regulating freight rates and charges of carriage both of passengers and freight. Now it will not do for any man, I care not whether he occupies the highest office in the gift of this people, or what his station is, to lay claim that he is the great political Columbus that discovered the proposition that we are now considering. Why, Congress as early as 1868 in this House appointed a committee, or at least referred a resolution to a committee, for the purpose of investigating the question of the power of Congress to regulate freight rates in interstate shipments, and a report was made to the House.

The Senate, in 1874, did the same thing, which resulted in the Windom report, which I have at hand. Later on, led by that great patriot and statesman, Judge Reagan, from Texas, in 1886, this House enacted a law which, amended, became known when on the statute books as the "Interstate Commerce Commission law." In 1868 this House received a report from the Committee on Roads and Canals in which they laid down the proposition, and sustained it, to my satisfaction at least, and I think to the satisfaction of anyone who will read it, of the right of Congress in the exercise of the interstate powers given to it under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and the other provision, to make all rules necessary and proper for carrying out the powers therein granted the Congress of the United States by the Constitution—did have the right under that power to regulate rates of railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

I hope to be able to show, before I get through with this argument, the law and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and other courts which demonstrate that right now existing in Congress.

Can it be said, Mr. Chairman, that the right to regulate commerce only applied to the right to regulate the kind of commerce then in existence when the Constitution was adopted—by steamboat, by stagecoach, and other means of conveyance? Shall it be said that the fathers did not intend that whatever may have been the advancement in civilization, in science, in wealth, and in all those other things that have been discovered by the ingenuity of man in the advancement of civilization and commerce, that because they could not look beyond the hour into the future, to the year of 1905, when, speeding across upon iron bands that bind the Union together in commerce and transportation, great interstate trains traverse the country—that they were not able to say, did not intend to say, that Congress should have the power to regulate these modern means of interstate transportation; that when Congress regulated navigation transportation in ships between the States, the stagecoach upon the public highway and across the bridges, and means of transportation like these; that when this power was exercised over these means of transportation then known and used it ceased; that modern civilization and science has destroyed it? Ah, that could not be true.

The men who organized and established this great Government of ours, the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence, the men who framed the Constitution of the United States, seem to me to have been inspired from above and to have written it as if they had written it to answer the demands of the coming ages and to meeting all the changing vicissitudes of time and progress. We need not go beyond the provision of the Constitution as it has been construed—as I believe properly—by the courts, both by judges who were Federalists and judges who were Democratic, in order to show that the power of Congress, exercised as it must be and will be under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, is not an invasion of the rights of the State, but is simply an assertion and use of that power granted to the Congress of the United States by the people of the States themselves. Why, Judge Marshall, in the first case in which he deals with this subject, that of McCulloch against Maryland, uses this language:

It was contended that the powers of the General Government are delegated by the States, who alone are truly sovereign, and must be exercised in subordination to the States, who alone possess supreme dominion.

Chief Justice Marshall, in reply to the contention, said: "It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The Convention which framed the Constitution was indeed elected by the State legislatures, but the instrument when it came from their hands was a mere proposal, without obligation or pretensions to it."

The Constitution was reported to the then existing Congress and was by them submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its legislatures for their assent and ratification. Under this mode of proceeding, adopted by the Convention, by Congress, and by the States, the instrument was submitted to the people. From these conventions the Constitution derived its whole authority. The Government proceeds directly from the people, etc. When the Constitution was thus adopted it was a complete obligation and bound the State sovereignties. "The Government of the Union then is emphatically and truly a government of the people. In form and substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit." * * * "If any one proposition could command universal assent of mankind we might expect it would be this: That the Government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action." (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 405.)

Now, that was decided, it is true, in a case which denied the right of the State to tax the United States Bank. I know that, following that decision, criticisms have been made that that decision and others made by the eminent justice changed the intention of the founders of the Government and of the Constitution makers from a Republic of independent States to a great National Government. I do not believe that to be the fact now or then. It is true that the powers of Congress have been extended, in my judgment, much further than they ought to have been in many instances under the interstate-commerce clause, but it has been invoked by the people, who would shelter themselves from the assertion of the right of the State to protect them from unjust and improper exactions at the hands of the people and corporations that would plunder them. Therefore if the people of the United States can not by their State laws protect themselves in the way of regulating railroad charges beyond their borders, and if Congress has not the power to regulate those charges, then, indeed, has come the day and the hour when the people are owned by the wealth and power of the corporations. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am ready at all times to uphold the rights of the State with reference to the enforcement of law within its borders and within its own sphere; yet I shall always be ready to concede to the General Government the powers that the people of the United States have granted to it within that instrument; and if it becomes necessary to protect my people and the people of this great country from exactions, from extortions, from robberies under the forms of law, then I am willing to extend the interpretation of the Constitution in order to relieve the people. [Applause.] But I do not have to do it. I am glad of that, Mr. Chairman.

Now, if there ever was a man whom we as Democrats could rely upon—we who revere the name of a great statesman and a great Democrat—it is the great Senator from South Carolina, Mr. John C. Calhoun. We can always find words of wisdom that instruct those Democrats who have come after him, and we may safely follow in the path where his footsteps have trod. He ever sought to maintain the rights of the States, but also yielded and maintained the legitimate and granted rights of the Federal Government. If we can get authority from this great Democrat to exercise the power under the Constitution we seek here in this bill to use, we are fortunate indeed. His devotion to the rights of the States and their power can not be questioned when we recall that he denied the power of the General Government to collect a tariff tax at the ports of his own State without its consent.

In a report made on the 26th day of June, 1846, to the Senate, speaking of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce, he said:

They—

are of the opinion, after due reflection, that they conferred upon Congress all the powers which by a fair interpretation belong to the States as fully as the States themselves possess it, except such, if there be any, as may be prohibited by the Constitution from being exercised either expressly or by implication. That they confer on Congress all the power to regulate commerce with each other, with that exception, would seem to be so clear as hardly to admit of doubt, as the words by which it is delegated are used without qualification or condition. But if there should be room for doubt it would be removed by adverting to the reasons for delegating the power. It was not to limit it or prohibit it as a power of a dangerous character, and which on that account ought to be restricted or prohibited. On the contrary, it was regarded as one of the utmost utility and on the proper control of which the prosperity of the States essentially depended, and it was accordingly for the purpose of obtaining such control, as well as preventing collisions among the States, and not to restrict or prohibit it, that it was delegated to the Federal Government as their common representative and organ in their external relations with each other and with foreign nations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there we have the judgment of this illustrious Democrat as authority for my statement that I do not violate the Constitution of the United States in voting for this bill. I am sustained in that idea by the opinion left to us by that distinguished statesman and loyal Democrat, and that being so, I think I can stand before my people and before the country, before lawyers, and before my fellow-Democrats as not advocating a violation of the Constitution or any extension of power to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, let us see. I have been taking pains with this because I am going to lead up to something else. If I can establish the legal proposition that Congress has the power under this interstate-commerce clause to regulate railroad rates, then I have established the proposition that the people will be relieved, because we all understand that, driven at last from every other field of encounter, the railroads have entrenched themselves in the belief, first, that such a measure can not pass both branches of Congress, and, finally, if it should, that they will endeavor to defeat the will of the people by asserting that the right to regulate the charges that they make upon the people does not exist under the Constitution of the United States.

Before discussing here further the power of Congress to regulate interstate railways, I will first discuss the power of the various States to regulate the charges of those interstate railways, which are public highways by reason of the fact that they are chartered by the States, are in the nature of monopolies, and are engaged in the performance of a quasi public or governmental function. If the States have both the right to regulate these railways and their charges and to delegate to commissions that power, then the Congress, if it exercise it, must assert that power and use it under section 8, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, which is called the "commerce clause" of the Constitution, and that other authority given in the same section to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution such powers. First, then, have the States this power to regulate rates of transportation on interstate lines, and if they have can such power be delegated to a commission or other administrative body to carry out the legislative will? This power, though always resisted by the railroads when sought to be exercised by the States, has never been denied by the courts.

The power to regulate the charges for railroad transportation rests upon the following grounds:

1. Public necessity.
2. That these concerns often exercise a monopoly.
3. The fact that they have been specially franchised or chartered and so assumed obligations to the public.

Said Judge Bradley, in the Sinking Fund cases (99 U. S., 700, 747):

When an employment or business becomes a matter of such public interest and importance as to create a common charge or burden upon the citizen; in other words, when it becomes a practical monopoly, to which the citizen is obliged to resort and by means of which a tribute can be exacted from the community, it is subject to regulation by the legislative power.

An investigation of the common law and the decisions of the State courts will show many occupations whose charges have been regulated, and the rule seems to be settled that once the occupation is classed a public calling, or is engaged in serving the public by reason of some power or franchise granted to it by the State, the legislature has the right to fix the price that may be charged. (People v. Budd, 117 N. Y., 1; S. C. 115 Am.

St. Rep., 460; affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in 143 U. S., 517.)

Said the supreme court of Illinois, in the case of Rouggles v. People (91 Ill., 262):

If then the legislature may fix the rate of charges by individuals as common carriers, warehousemen, or others exercising a calling or business public in its character, or in which the public has an interest to be protected against extortion or oppression, that body may do the same thing and fix the maximum charges of corporations exercising the same business. Of this there can, we apprehend, be no doubt. (S. C. 108 U. S., 525.)

It is the assertion of no new legal principle that the legislative body has the right to regulate charges for the use of property, even though it be private property, when for a particular purpose the public have a right to use it. Within boundary every government has the right to prescribe regulations demanded by the general welfare for the common protection of all. This power of government was said by Justice Taney, in 5 Howard, 583 (License Cases), to be "inherent in every sovereignty—the power to govern men and things. This is, however, not an uncontrollable, despotic power, subject to no limitations, exercisable without reason at the whim or caprice of the legislative body, but within its legitimate domain, the power is original, absolute, and indefeasible."

Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Allnut v. Inglis (12 East, 527), said:

There is no doubt that the general principle is favored, both in law and justice, that every man may fix what price he pleases upon his own property or the use of it; but if, for a particular purpose, the public have a right to resort to his premises and make use of them and he have a monopoly in them for that purpose, if he will take the benefit of that monopoly he must, as an equivalent, perform the duty attached to it on reasonable terms.

Lord Hale, in the treatises De Portibus Maris and De Jure Maris, so largely quoted from in the opinions in the Munn case, used the language that when private property is "affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only," in assigning the reason why ferries and public wharves should be under public regulation, and only reasonable tolls charged. The right to establish a ferry was a franchise, and no man could set up a ferry, although he owned the soil and landing places on both sides of the stream, without a charter from the King or a prescription, time out of mind. The franchise to establish ferries was a royal prerogative, and the grant of the King was necessary to authorize a subject to establish a public ferry, even on his own premises. When we recur to the origin and purpose of this prerogative it will be seen that it was vested in the King as a means by which a business in which the whole community was interested could be regulated. In other words, it was simply one mode of exercising a prerogative of government—that is to say, through the Sovereign instead of through Parliament—in a matter of public concern. This and similar prerogatives were vested in the King for public purposes, and not for his private advantage or emolument.

Lord Kenyon, in Rorke v. Dayrell (4 Term Rep., 410), said:

The prerogatives of the Crown are not given for the personal advantage of the King, but they are allowed to exist because they are beneficial to the subject.

And it is said in Chitty on Prerogatives, 4:

The splendor, rights, and power of the crown were attached to it for the benefit of the people, and not for the private gratification of the subject.

And Lord Hale, in one of the passages referred to, in stating the reason why a man may not set up a ferry without a charter from the King, says:

Because it doth in consequence tend to a common charge, and is become a thing of public interest and use, and every man for his passage pays a toll which is a common charge, and every ferry ought to be under a public regulation.

The right to take tolls for wharfage in a public port was also a franchise, and tolls, as Lord Hale says, could not be taken without lawful title by charter or prescription (De Portibus Maris, 77). But the King, if he maintained a public wharf, was under the same obligation as a subject to exact only reasonable tolls; nor could the King authorize unreasonable tolls to be taken by a subject. The language of Lord Hale is explicit upon both these points:

If the King or subject have a public wharf into which all persons that come to that port must come to unload their goods, as for the purpose, because they are the wharves only licensed by the Queen, according to the statute of 1 Elizabeth, chapter 11, or because there is no other wharf in that port, as it may fall out when a port is newly erected, in that case there can not be taken arbitrary and excessive duties for cranage, wharfage, passage, etc. Neither can they be enhanced to an immoderate degree; but the duties must be reasonable and moderate, though settled by the King's license or charter.

These modern American "railway kings" and "captains of finance" assert and demand more power than our English ancestors would permit the kings of England to exercise. In the name of and in behalf of the American people I would stay by law the rapacity of these modern railway kings and protect the public from their unjust exactions by this law. I would teach them that they, too, like the English kings, can exact "only reasonable tolls from the people." [Applause.]

The Georgia railroad commission case aptly illustrates the contention here now made that Congress has the right to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix what shall be reasonable and just rates upon the interstate railroad lines. If the legislature of Georgia could, as it did, delegate to a commission the power to regulate freight and passenger traffic over the roads in that State, and this was constitutional under the constitution of Georgia, and if it were a proper delegation of power by the legislature, then I see no reason why Congress can not, when these same railroads engage in interstate commerce, and thus become subject to the powers of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission a like power to fix rates on interstate shipments. The constitution of Georgia requires that the various departments of the government, being the legislative, the judicial, and executive, shall remain separate and distinct, and no person discharging the duties of one shall at the same time exercise the functions of the other. The constitution of Georgia of 1877 confers upon the legislature the power and authority of regulating railroad freight and passenger traffic, preventing unjust discriminations and requiring reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs. It also makes it the duty of the legislature to pass laws to carry into effect this constitutional provision and to enforce the same by suitable penalty.

In pursuance of that power the legislature in 1879 created a railroad commission and provided that fair and reasonable rates only shall be charged by the railroads of the State; and further provided for the appointment of three railroad commissioners, whose duty it shall be to make reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs to be observed by all the railroad companies doing business in the State. This act was attacked in two cases—first, in the case of Tilley v. The S. F. and W. R. R. Co. (5 Fed. Rep., 641), which was decided by Judge Wood, circuit court judge, and afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case the complainant insisted that the constitution of Georgia required the general assembly itself to regulate railroad freight and passenger tariffs, and that the delegation of this duty to these railroad commissioners was contrary to the constitution of Georgia, and therefore sought an injunction to enjoin the enforcement of the rates prescribed by the commission. Judge Wood, in a very able and exhaustive opinion, held that the legislature of Georgia had the right to delegate to a commission power to fix rates over the railroads in Georgia, and said, on page 656:

The fixing of just and reasonable maximum rates for all the railroads in the State is clearly a duty which can not be performed by the legislature unless it remains in perpetual session and devotes a large portion of its time to its performance. The question, What are just and reasonable rates? is one which presents different phases from month to month upon every road in the State, and in reference to all the innumerable articles and products that are the subjects of transportation. This question can only be satisfactorily solved by a board which is in perpetual session, and whose time is exclusively given to the consideration of the subject. It is obvious that to require the duty of prescribing rates for the railroads of the State to be performed by the general assembly, which meets in regular session only once in two years, and then only for a period of forty days, would result in the most ill-advised and haphazard schedules, and be productive of the greatest inconvenience and injustice, in some cases to the railroad companies and in others to the people of the State. It is impracticable for such a body to prescribe just and reasonable rates. To insist that this duty must be performed by the general assembly itself is to defeat the purpose of that clause of the constitution under consideration.

And again he said:

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power to levy and collect taxes; but this does not require Congress itself to assess the property of the taxpayer and collect the tax. The constitution of Georgia clothes the general assembly with the power of taxation over the whole State, and requires taxes to be assessed upon all property ad valorem; but this does not require the legislature to investigate through its committees or otherwise and declare by an act the value of every piece of property in the State subject to taxation.

And after citing a number of authorities, one of which is the case of Cincinnati, etc., Railroad Company v. Clinton County (1 Ohio St., 77), in which case he declares that the rule applicable to the delegation of power by the legislature is laid down with great clearness, he concludes as follows:

My conclusion upon this point is, therefore, that the act creating the Georgia railroad commission is not unconstitutional by reason of the delegation to the railroad commissioners of legislative power.

Again, in the case of the Georgia Railroad v. Smith (70 Ga., 694), the validity of the law establishing the Georgia railroad commission, and giving it power to fix rates, was attacked, mainly upon two grounds: First, because under the constitution of Georgia the duty was imposed upon the general assembly to regulate freight and passenger tariffs, and, second, because the act establishing the commission was unconstitutional and void, as being an attempt to delegate legislative powers to said railroad commission. These questions are taken up, and in a very able and exhaustive opinion by Justice Crawford the court rendered a judgment refusing to declare the law unconstitutional for the reasons assigned, and decided that under the constitution of Georgia the power was conferred upon the legislature to regulate railroad freight and passenger tariffs, but that it was not expected that the legislature should do more than pass laws to accomplish the end in view, nor were they required to enter into the details of settling freights and tariffs over all the roads in the State; that they had constitutional power to delegate to the railroad commissioners authority to carry into effect the laws passed by the legislature, and that such commissioners are constitutional officers.

From the decision of the supreme court of Georgia the case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, and is reported in 128 United States Reports, page 174, in which the decision of the supreme court of Georgia was affirmed. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion rendered by Justice Field, after stating that the supreme court of Georgia held—

> That this delegation of authority by the legislature to the commission to prescribe what shall be reasonable and just rates for the carriage and transportation of persons and property over the railroads within its limits was a proper exercise of its power to provide protection for its citizens against unjust rates for such transportation and to prevent unjust discriminations, and that it was expected, not that the legislature would itself make specific regulations as to what should in each case be a proper charge, but that it would simply provide the means by which such rates should be ascertained and enforced—

Said, in reviewing that decision—

> it has been adjudged by this court in numerous instances that the legislature of a State has the power to prescribe the charges of a railroad company for the carriage of persons and merchandise within its limits. (Citing in support Stone v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 116 U. S. 307; Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S., 680.)

He further declares in this opinion:

> The incorporation of the company, by which numerous parties are permitted to act as a single party for the purpose of its creation, or, as Chief Justice Marshall expresses it, by which "the character and properties of individuality" are bestowed "on a collective and changing body of men" (Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet., 514, 562); the grant to it of special privileges to carry out the object of its incorporation, particularly the authority to exercise the State's right of eminent domain that it may appropriate needed property—a right which can be exercised only for a public purpose—and the obligation assumed by the acceptance of its charter to transport all persons and merchandise, upon like conditions and upon reasonable rates, affect the property and employment with a public use; and where property is thus affected the business in which it is used is subject to legislative control. So long as the use continues the power of regulation remains, and the regulation may extend not merely to provisions for the security of passengers and freight against accidents and for the convenience of the public, but also to prevent extortion by unreasonable charges and favoritism by unjust discriminations.

Thus we trace the decision of the question from the State court into the United States circuit court, and afterwards to the Supreme Court of the United States, all of which upheld and sustained the power of the legislature of Georgia to create the railroad commission and authorize it to fix reasonable and just charges for freight and passenger tariffs on the railroads in Georgia, and none of these courts questioned the power of the legislature of Georgia so to regulate the charges of these railroads or to delegate that power to a commission.

To repeat the language of Justice Field in the case in 128 United States, 179:

> This is not a new doctrine, but old doctrine, always asserted whenever property or business is, by reason of special privileges, received from the Government, the better to secure the purposes to which the property is dedicated or devoted, affected with a public use. There have been differences of opinion among the judges of this court in some cases as to the circumstances or conditions under which some kinds of property or business may be properly held to be thus affected, as in Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113, 126, 139, 146), but none as to the doctrine that when such use exists the business becomes subject to legislative control in all respects necessary to protect the public against danger, injustice, and oppression.

The State which grants charters to railroad companies invested with corporate life and power to build and operate and charge tolls upon their roads, has the right, because of the nature of the privileges conferred upon such railroad companies and the character of the obligations assumed by them, to regulate the rates and charges of such corporations as the business of such roads becomes affected with a public use and is subject to legislative regulation. Railroads that engage in interstate commerce, although they derive their charters not from the Congress of the United States, become subject to the laws of Congress and the right of Congress to regulate the business of such transportation companies. That States may regulate, within their own borders, the business of railroads seems to be admitted, and in a number of casses (referred to in other brief) this right has been sustained. (19 Fed. Rep., 679; 32 Fed. Rep., 849; 52 Am. Rep., 193.)

Railroads are public highways. (Rwy. Co. v. U. S., 93 U. S. R., 442; R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 163 U. S. R., 585.)

The right of the States to regulate railroad charges by a commission and through the aid of commissioners has been held to extend to all measures deemed essential not merely to secure the safety of passengers and freight, but to promote the convenience of the public in the transaction of business with them and to prevent abuses by extortionate rates and unjust discriminations. (Charlotte Rwy. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S., 386; State v. Asylum Bridge Commission, 63 Conn., 91; Railroad Co. v. Boston, etc., 102 Mass., 386.)

In New York it was held not to be unconstitutional to confer power upon a State board of railroad commissioners to determine whether the public interests did not require a railroad corporation to extend its railroad, etc. (65 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep., 266; 135 Mass., 175.)

In the case of Martin v. Witherspoon (135 Mass., 175) it was held that where the legislature provided that the Commissioners of Pilots of Boston Harbor might recommend to the governor and council a change or modification of the pilotage regulations of the ports, etc., which, when approved and proclaimed, were to have force and effect of law. The law was attacked as being an improper delegation of authority, and that it was a surrender of the power of legislation to the governor and council, and the right of the legislature to confer this power upon the pilotage commissioners was upheld by the supreme court of Massachusetts. Says the court:

> Such regulations are in the nature of police regulations, the making of which within defined limits may be intrusted to other bodies than the legislature.

Generally speaking, a railroad commission is merely an administrative body, created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislature. They are purely creatures of statute, and possess no powers except what the statute expressly confers upon them, and in every case their authority must affirmatively appear. (Reagan v. Loan Co., 154 U. S., 367.)

The principal purpose of most of the statutes which have created such railroad commissions is the regulation of freight and passenger rates. They have, however, been invested with comprehensive powers of regulation over all matters relating to the safety of passengers and freight and the convenience of the public in its business relations with the railroads. These powers can be granted to them. (See Pac. R. R. v. Commission, 12 Sawyers, 559; Sou. Pac. Co. v. R. R. Commissioners, 78 Fed. Rep., 236.)

A legislative body does not transcend its constitutional powers in delegating to a railroad commission the authority to fix reasonable transportation rates for railroad companies, to prevent unjust discriminations and preferences, and to regulate other matters pertaining to transportation within the State in which the public is interested, since no legislative power is delegated to the commission. (Decided by North Carolina supreme court, 55 Am. and Eng. Ry. Cases, 498.)

The court there seemed to take it for granted—and they were right in so doing—that the legislature has the authority to provide reasonable rules and regulations in respect to freight and passenger tariffs to be charged by railroads, and they speak of it as too well settled to admit of discussion, and cite as upholding this doctrine the following cases: Railroad Company v. Richmond, 104 North Carolina, 673; Railroad Company v. Iowa, 94 United States, 155; Railroad Company v. Richmond, 19 Wallace, 584.

The court further states in the opinion that it is equally well settled that in delegating such authority to a commission the legislature does not transcend its constitutional powers. (116 U. S., 307.)

The authorities seemed to sum up the following as the rule on the subject:

> The difference between the power to pass a law and the power to adopt rules and regulations in respect to a law already passed is apparent and great, and this we maintain to be a distinction recognized strikingly by the courts as the true rule in determining whether or not in such cases the legislative power is granted. The former would be unconstitutional, while the latter is not. (Railroad Co. v. Smith, 9 Am. and Eng. Rwy. Cases, 385.)

In the case discussed by the North Carolina court, the act invested the commission with authority to make such just and reasonable rules and regulations as might be necessary for preventing excessive charges and unjust discriminations and preferences, which the act had declared to be unlawful.

I desire to call attention to the case of Railroad Co. v. Jones (149 Ill., 361; S. C., 41 Am. St. Rep., 278), which construes a statute declaring that railroads should not charge and collect more than a fair and reasonable rate, toll, or compensation. The supreme court of Illinois held this to be a constitutional grant of power to a commission, and could be enforced through a commission, and that the courts had power under the act to determine what is reasonable. In that same case the court held that the statute which created the commission and which omitted to fix the maximum rates or charges for the carriers, but created a commission with authority to make schedules, which should be prima facie evidence of the reasonableness of rates to be charged, was a valid statute.

They also held that authorizing a board of commissioners to make a schedule of rates instead of the legislature fixing the freight and fares to be charged by railroad companies is not a delegation to the board of commissioners of the legislative power to establish such rates, and, therefore, is not invalid. This case deals fully with the entire subject and upholds the power of the State to confer power upon a commission, so long as it does not undertake to make the decision of the commission final, or prevent a judicial inquiry as to the reasonableness of such rates.

On this subject I call attention to the case of Railroad Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418), and the case of Budd v. New York (143 U. S., 517).

To sum up the doctrine, it is this: Statutes which create boards of commissioners and authorize them to make schedules of rates for railroad companies, are not invalid as being a delegation of legislative power. The doctrine of the cases is that the functions of such boards are administrative rather than legislative; that the authority conferred upon them relates merely to the execution of a law; that the grant of legislative power to do a certain thing carries with it the power to use all proper and necessary means to accomplish the end, and that as the reasonableness of rates changes with circumstances, and legislatures can not be continuously in session, the requirement that the statute itself shall fix the charge might preclude the legislature from the use of the agencies necessary to perform the duty imposed upon it by the constitution; in short, that the legislature may authorize others to do things which it might properly, but can not conveniently or advantageously, do itself.

In the case of Chicago Railroad Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418) and Minneapolis Railroad Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 467) the power of the States to regulate the charges of common carriers and to delegate these powers to a commission was considered and reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Where a State delegates power to a railroad commission to fix just and reasonable rates for freight and passenger tariff to be observed by the railroad companies, such statute is not void as being a delegation of legislative power. (McWhorter v. R. R. Co., 24 Fla., 417; 32 Am. St. Rep., 814; 12 Am. St. Rep., 220.)

DELEGATION OF POWERS.

There is no constitutional reason why legislative functions which are merely administrative or executive should not be delegated by that branch of the Government to other departments, or to bodies created by it for that purpose. A distinction is drawn between the delegation of powers to make a law, involving necessarily a discretion as to what it shall be, and a grant of authority relative to its execution, though the latter involves the exercise of discretion under and in pursuance of the law. (6th vol. 2d Ed. Am. and Eng. Enc. of Law, 1029, 1030; Cincinnati, etc., R. R. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. R., 88; Moers v. Reading, 21 Pa. St., 202.)

A statute which gave the power to the governor and his council to make or change pilotage regulations upon the recommendation of the pilotage commissioners was held to be a proper delegation of power. (135 Mass., 175.)

It is not an unauthorized delegation of power for the legislature to authorize a board of highway commissioners to provide reasonable rules and regulations in respect to fixing transportation tariffs. (6th vol. Am. and Eng. Enc. of Law, 1030; 32 Am. St. Rep., 805; 55 Am. and Eng. Rwy. Cases, 498; 12 Am. St. Reps., 220; Woodruff v. New York R. R. Co., 59 Conn., 63.)

This last case referred to gave the commission power to change railroads from grade crossings. (Chicago R. R. Co. v. Jones, 149 Ill., 361; S. C. 41 Am. St. Rep., 278.)

This case goes very fully into the question, and discusses the power of the State to confer upon a railroad commission the right to fix reasonable rates. (See also the case of the brig Aurora v. The United States, 7 Cranch; Dow v. Beidleman, 125 U. S., 680, and the several cases to be found in the 94 U. S. R.)

From these cases we conclude that undoubtedly the legislature has the authority to declare what is a reasonable rate or compensation for the railroad to charge, or to fix reasonable charges, or, in the absence of statutory regulations upon the subject, the courts must determine what is reasonable.

Under the common law the carrier must accept and transport the goods for a reasonable charge. This would be true without any statute. But the legislature has the right to fix a reasonable charge and to delegate that authority to a commission. The purpose of the act of 1887, known as the "interstate-commerce act," is fully set out in the opinion of Justice Brown, in the case of The Interstate Commission v. Baltimore Railroad (145 U. S., 263), wherein the purpose and object sought to be accomplished by the passage of the act is reviewed. (See Snyder on Interstate-Commerce Act, pages 34 and 35, citing Atchison v. Denver R. R., 110 U. S. R., 667.)

As to the power of the Government to prescribe rates, see Snyder, pages 43, 44.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in one of the earliest cases before it, viz, Thatcher v. Hudson Canal Company (1 I. C. C. Rep., 152), speaking through Judge Cooley, decided:

> Its power in respect to rates is to determine whether those imposed by the railroad are for any reason in conflict with the statute, and later on the Commission decided that the Commission is not primarily a rate-making body. The carrier is left free to arrange its own tariffs in the first instance. We sit for the correction of what is unreasonable and unjust in these tariffs, and the Commission up to the date of these decisions and up to now has never assumed in the first instance to make a rate.

Yet they acted upon the idea that it was their duty to determine whether the rate complained of was just and reasonable, and if found to be unjust and unreasonable, to correct that violation of the statute, and in so doing it was but reasonable to assume that the only way to do so was to prohibit the charging of an unreasonable rate and to compel the charging of one that was reasonable.

This power was exercised by the Commission until the Supreme Court of the United States decided no such power had been granted.

In 1896 and 1897 three decisions were rendered virtually emasculating the Commission of any power. Up to that time, of the 135 orders made 68 were cases where a change of rate for the future was prescribed, and most of them were observed by the railroads. It is, therefore, to enable the Commission to carry out the first section of this act to regulate commerce, which declares that all interstate rates shall be reasonable and just, and which prohibits the exaction of rates that are not reasonable and just, that this legislation is intended.

The authority of Congress to regulate railroad rates was stated by the Supreme Court of the United States to exist under the following circumstances:

> When goods shipped under a through bill of lading, or in any other way indicating a common control, management, or arrangement, from a point in one State to a point in another State are received in transit by a State common carrier, if a railroad company, must be deemed to have subjected its road to an arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment within the meaning of the act to regulate commerce. (Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. R., 184.)
> The Commission is an administrative board, and the courts are only to be resorted to when the Commission prefers to enforce the provisions of the statute by a direct proceeding in the court or when the orders of the Commission have been disregarded. (Id., p. 196.)

It was in this case also that the court for the first time intimated that the Congress did not intend to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to itself fix rates, for the court said that that question was mooted in the court below, and was discussed in the briefs of counsel in that case; and they said:

> We do not find any provision of the act that expressly or by necessary implication confers such a power.

This case was decided March 30, 1896. Realizing the effect that this decision had on the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the national Democratic convention at Chicago, in July, 1896, in its platform demanded "the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such restrictions and guaranties in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression."

This case, it is true, was followed by the decisions in 167 United States, known as the "Maximum Rate cases," and again in the case of The Interstate Commerce Commission v. The Alabama Midland Railroad (168, p. 144). But as early as March, 1896, it was known that the court would hold that the act of 1887 had not conferred upon the Commission power to fix rates.

I will now discuss the power of Congress to regulate railroad charges, of those railways engaged in interstate commerce, under section 8, article 1 of the Constitution.

In Gibbons against Ogden (9 Wheaton, 189 and 194) Chief Justice Marshall defines what commerce is and construes its meaning under the provision of the Constitution to regulate commerce, and to make laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers delegated in the Constitution to Congress, and shows that it comprehended "navigation." In the same case Mr. Justice Johnson concurred.

We know who Justice Johnson was. He was one who did not undertake to strain the Constitution in order to maintain Federal power. We know he was a great lawyer and an honest and learned judge.

He said:

> Commerce in its simplest signification means an exchange of goods; but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligent care, and the various mediums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce.

Mr. Chairman, nearly a hundred years ago this judge decided what commerce meant, as though with prophetic eye he saw into the future, when the greater part of the commerce would be interstate, and clearly indicates that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to confine and limit the word "commerce," as was contended for in that case, viz, to traffic—to the mere buying and selling or the interchange of commodities; for he says:

> The subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation. Shipbuilding and the carrying trade and the propagation of seamen are such vital agents of commercial prosperity that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not possess power to regulate commerce.

Let the House understand, the purpose of this argument is to demonstrate and show from a legal standpoint that when you establish the fact that railroads when they engage in interstate commerce and traffic become themselves the objects of commerce, and, therefore, subject to be regulated by the Congress of the United States, you destroy the last argument and batter down the strongholds behind which the railroads now intrench themselves. I think a careful consideration of some of these decisions to which I will refer will demonstrate to the House that there can be no doubt of the right of Congress to so exercise this power constitutionally.

In the passenger cases (7 Howard, 416) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> Commerce consists, amongst other things, in buying from one nation and selling to another, or in transporting the merchandise from the seller to gain the freight.

In the case of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company v. Pennsylvania (82 U. S. R. (15 Wall.), 232, 284) the court said:

> Beyond all question the transportation of freight or of the subjects of commerce for the purposes of exchange or sale is a constituent of commerce itself.

If transportation is a constituent of commerce, and Congress can regulate and control and has the supreme power exclusively to control such transportation when it becomes interstate, upon what can be based the argument that it can control in every particular except to regulate the price of the transportation?

Now—

Said this court, in the case just referred to—> this has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. It would be absurd to suppose that the transmission of the subjects of trade from the seller to the buyer or from the place of production to the market was not contemplated, for without that there could be no consummated trade with foreign nations or amongst the States.

That is the great argument now; the fathers could not see that these great transportation companies, combined into six powerful monopolies, as they now are, would carry three-fourths of all the traffic of this great country. They could not foresee that in a short while after the Supreme Court by its decision removed the restraining hand of the Interstate Commerce Commission from them these great railway monopolies would plunder the people of the United States to the amount of $155,000,000 by a simple change of classification of freight and an advance in rates. These six systems, with a few independent lines, controlling 214,000 miles, received from its business $2,073,177,325 during the last year as its gross earnings. Can you comprehend it? Can the people of the country realize how great are these amounts that are taken from them in the transportation of freight and passengers—$2,073,000,000? How much does the Government take from the pockets of the people to run the Government? In 1905, excluding the postal receipts, it took $544,000,274. The expenses for the post-office were $152,000,000; so, adding that to the other, it amounts to not quite $700,000,000 as the receipts of the Government from every source; and yet these railroad corporations have received nearly three times as much in revenues as has the Government of the United States. The Government taxes its people about $7 per capita to carry on the business of the Government, while the railroads tax the people nearly $27 per capita to carry the freight and passengers over the public highways of the nation.

Why, Mr. Chairman, an increase of one-half a mill a mile per ton—mark it—the increase of one-half of a mill a ton per mile on the amount of tonnage carried by the railroad for 1904 would at once have added to the receipts of these railroad corporations over $88,000,000. One-twentieth of a cent per ton per mile would increase it to nearly $100,000,000; and yet this great business, concentrated in the hands of a few, controlling the shipment, both interstate and foreign, the very lifeblood of the people, because these public highways are but the arteries through which the commercial life of the people flow, controlling all this immense property, defy the State; and the Supreme Court of the United States in its power and proper construction of the Constitution protect them from the State laws; they have defeated the right of the State to enact laws that protect the people on interstate freights; they defy Congress, and hope to escape it by undertaking to say that it was not within the knowledge or intention of the fathers that a railroad would be built or operated to transport freight between the States; but they never dreamed that the railroad corporations of the country would become so powerful that they would become greater than the law and greater than the Constitution. [Applause.]

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to injure the property of any man. I have no desire to diminish the dividend of any proper, legitimate, honest investment, but I am unwilling to continue this state of affairs in the United States if by my voice or by my vote I can correct it; and I shall be able by this legislation, if it shall pass, to take from the throats of the American producer and the American consumer the grasping, choking fingers of these railroad corporations. [Applause.] And I shall do it under the law of my country, under the law which I revere, under the Constitution which is the sheet anchor of every man who lives beneath the flag that represents the sovereignty of his country. I am amenable to the law, and so is every citizen, from the humblest to the greatest, in this great country. There are only a few people in the country who snap their fingers in the face of the law. One of them, a railroad magnate, gave much evidence of it in the examination in New York a few days ago, when he snapped his fingers and said, "What do I care for the law?" I desire that they shall learn the law, and that the constitutionally enacted law shall relieve the people of the burdens under which they groan, and that everyone shall be made to respect the law, even though he counts his fortunes by the hundreds of millions. They should be made to obey the laws, though we shall have to put some of them where they deserve to go—in the penitentiaries of the country. [Applause.]

Now, you hear a great deal on this subject about the innocent stockholders. Who owns the stock of these great railroads? A few of them are owned by some citizens. Go to my own State, for example. The railroads were built by its own people, subscribed by the money that they have made at their avocations on their plantations, in their stores, and they built and operated them until the railroads became wealth-producing property, when they fell beneath the greedy eye of the Wall street manipulators of railroad stock. Soon every Georgia railroad, except the one that runs from Atlanta to Augusta, is found destroyed, wrecked, bankrupted, proceedings instigated by the people that should have protected the railroads from all assault of any kind. Soon they fell within the capacious and insatiate maw of Wall street, and now they have become a part of the Morgan system. Who in Georgia is a stockholder in the Morgan syndicate of the Georgia roads? A few most excellent men hold stock enough to become directors, but they obey and carry out the policy dictated by those who control in Wall street. I have nothing to say with reference to the gentlemen who own these properties and who run them. They are not to answer to me or to my people for the plunder of the stockholder and the wrecking of his property, but I would have them answer to the law, and I would have them restrained by the law when they continue, in order to further enrich their greed and power, to exact from my people or from the people of the United States unjust discrimination, unfair, unreasonable, and exorbitant charges. So there is but one way to do it, Mr. Chairman, and that is to exercise the power of Congress under this bill.

Now, have we got it? I desire to call attention to a decision rendered in the United States circuit court of Iowa by Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, presiding, in the case of Gray v. Clinton Bridge Company, in 1868, nearly thirty-eight years ago. This great judge seemed to see into the future, in fact did see, and pointed out in clear and lucid language the right to exercise the power we are here contending for. In the case of In re Clinton Bridge, at the October term, 1867, the circuit court for the district of Iowa rendered a decision to be found in 1 Woolworth's Circuit Court Reports, page 150. (Same case to be found in 5 Federal Cases, case No. 2900, p. 1060.) Justice Miller decided:

Any means by which passengers and merchandise are transported is an element of commerce. This has been repeatedly held in respect to navigation, and Congress has repeatedly legislated on the subject accordingly. The railroad as much as the steamboat is a means of interchange of persons and property, which interchange is commerce itself. When railroads become portions of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in commerce, which embraces many States, to regulate them is to regulate commerce.

And it may not be amiss to read the opinion of this distinguished judge, for I am sure it is sound both in law and logic. Said he:

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce, because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce as well as when carried on by water, and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other. The "commerce among the States" spoken of in the Constitution must, at the time that that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the Constitution was adopted, a means by which merchandise is transported across States and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subject to the control of salutary Congressional legislation, because it is an instrument of commerce. Is there any reason why the other should not? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a State, and is, therefore, neither foreign commerce nor commerce among the States, it seems to me that where these roads become parts of great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States, and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government.

As already intimated, the shackles with which the different States fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present Constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce, since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the Federal Government, has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of that commerce again to the control of the States and to the consequent vexations and burdens which the States may impose through whose territories it must be carried on? And must all this be permitted because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the Constitution was framed?

For myself I must say that I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of one of those lines of interstate communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads, when the purposes of interstate transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

This case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision rendered by Judge Miller in the circuit court was upheld and the judgment affirmed. See Gray v. R. R. Co., 10 Wallace, 454–463 (77 U. S.).

Justice Field, an able Democratic judge, in his opinion in the case of Union Pacific Railroad v. Peniston (18 Wallace; 85 U. S., 47), cites the case of the Clinton Bridge and approves it.

This same great judge, Justice Miller, in the case of Minnesota v. The Railroad Company (134 U. S. R., 467), had occasion to again discuss the question of regulation of railroad rates by the States, and in an opinion delivered in that case clearly pointed out the powers of the State in that regard, the authority to delegate to a commission this power to fix the rates, the remedies that either the shipper or the railroad could resort to in order to resist the rates thus fixed by a commission, and the rules by which the court should be guided in passing upon the question. It is so full and complete that I read it:

1. In regard to the business of common carriers limited to points within a single State, that State has the legislative power to establish the rates of compensation for such carriage.

2. The power which the legislature has to do this can be exercised through a commission which it may authorize to act in the matter, such as the one appointed by the legislature of Minnesota by the act now under consideration.

3. Neither the legislature nor such commission, acting under the authority of the legislature, can establish arbitrarily, and without regard to justice and right, a tariff of rates for such transportation which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of persons engaged in the carrying business on the one hand nor so exorbitant as to be in utter disregard of the rights of the public for the use of such transportation on the other.

4. In either of these classes of cases there is an ultimate remedy by the parties aggrieved in the courts for relief against such oppressive legislation, and especially in the courts of the United States, where the tariff of rates established by the legislature or by the commission is such as to deprive a party of his property without due process of law.

5. But until the judiciary had been appealed to to declare the regulation made, whether by the legislature or by the commission, voidable for the reasons mentioned, the tariff of rates so fixed is the law of the land, and must be submitted to, both by the carrier and by the parties with whom he deals.

6. That the proper, if not the only, mode of judicial relief against the tariff of rates established by the legislature or by its commission is by a bill in chancery, asserting its unreasonable character and its conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and asking a decree of the court forbidding the corporation from exacting such fare as excessive or establishing its right to collect the rates as being within the limits of a just compensation for the service rendered.

7. That until this is done it is not competent for such individual having dealings with the carrying corporation, or for the corporation with regard to each individual who demands its services, to raise a contest in the courts over the question which ought to be settled in this general and conclusive method.

8. But in the present case, where an application is made to the supreme court of the State to compel the common carriers, namely, the railroad companies, to perform the services which their duty requires them to do for the general public, which is equivalent to establishing, by judicial proceeding, the reasonableness of the charges fixed by the commission, I think the court has the same duty to inquire into the reasonableness of the tariff of rates established by the commission before granting such relief that it would have if called upon to so do by a bill in chancery.

9. I do not agree that it was necessary to the validity of the action of the Commission that previous notice should have been given to all common carriers interested in the rates to be established, nor to any particular one of them, any more than it would have been necessary, which I think it is not, for the legislature to have given such notice if it had established such rates by legislative enactment.

10. But when the question becomes a judicial one, the validity and justice of these rates are not to be established or rejected by the judgment of a court, it is necessary that the railroad corporations interested in the fare to be considered should have notice and have a right to be heard on the question relating to such fare, which I have pointed out as judicial questions.

Now, I might as well right here read a decision which I have—a later one. The Supreme Court, in one of the cases in which they declared that the Commission had no power to fix rates, at the same time rendered this decision, which is found in 162 United States, page 184, the case of Cincinnati, etc., Railroad Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission:

When goods, shipped under through bill of lading, or any other way indicating a common control, management, or arrangement, from a point in one State to a point in another State, are received in transit by a State common carrier, such carrier, if a railroad company, must be deemed as subjecting its road to an arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment within the meaning of the act to regulate commerce.

Now, you understand that all these questions have been before the Supreme Court. The right of the Commission itself to exist, the right to have its orders enforced, and, finally, the right has been decided whether the Commission had the right to fix a rate in place of one found to be unreasonable, and it has been reserved to these astute railroad lawyers, some of them "ex's" and some of them in office now, to present a proposition to the country that, although all these questions have been before the country and the Supreme Court of the United States, they yet, neither lawyer nor judge, have never seen the great question, which ought to stand out most prominently if there was any reason for unconstitutionality, that Congress had no power to regulate freight rates on interstate railroad lines. [Applause.] This power of Congress over interstate commerce was sustained by a decision made by Justice Storey. I have collected these from Chief Justices Mashall and Taney, Justices Johnson and Storey, because they are the great lights amongst our national judiciary that illumine the judicial history of our country. One a Federalist, a great Chief Justice; the other a great Democrat, equally as distinguished. Marshall extending, as has been claimed, by implication the powers of the Government; Taney standing by the rights of the State, denying the right of Congress to legislate in some respects in reference to the rights of the citizens of a State to do what they pleased with its property, rendered a decision which finally resulted in civil war, and which could only be settled on the battlefield.

Those two Chief Justices, one a great Federalist, another a great Democrat, both dealt with the proposition as to the power of Congress over interstate commerce, and both upheld it. I have read Judge Marshall's views. I now call attention to one of Judge Taney's opinions. In the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh (12 How., U. S., 244), referring to the commerce power, Judge Taney says:

This power [the commercial power] is as extensive upon land as upon water. The Constitution makes no distinction in that respect. And if the admiralty jurisdiction in matters of contract and tort which the courts of the United States may lawfully exercise on the high seas can be extended to the Lakes, under the power to regulate commerce, it can with the same propriety, and on the same construction, be extended to contracts and torts on land where the commerce is between different States, and it may also embrace the vehicles and persons engaged in carrying it on.

He says further:

In further illustration of the unreasonableness of holding the admiralty jurisdiction to be coextensive with the power of Congress over commerce, the learned judge says: "It would (in that case) be in the power of Congress to confer admiralty jurisdiction upon its courts over the cars engaged in transporting passengers or merchandise from one State to another and over the persons engaged in conducting them."

Against the opinions of paid lawyers of the railway systems, against the opinions of people who would resist this great movement in the interest of the people, I put the decisions and the judgment of these great American Chief Justices of the Supreme Court. [Applause.] I will not detain the committee, Mr. Chairman, with undertaking to go over the old assertion of the right of the sovereign to regulate public highways, nor will I detain the committee, two-thirds of which are lawyers, with accepted, undisputed—except by railroad officials and railroad lawyers—right of the State as sovereign, and the power and the right of the National Government in the exercise of its sovereign power, when granting a franchise and a right to a corporation to exercise part of the sovereign power, that that corporation is under the control of the sovereign.

Now, I know they have been driven from the proposition that the States could not regulate and fix freights within its borders. We have fought that out with the railroads in my State through the superior court of the first control up to the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1877 there met a constitutional convention in my State, composed of its brainiest members and truest men, led by that immortal statesman who illustrated that State both in this House and in the Senate, who attracted the attention of the United States and of the world by the power of his intellect and greatness of his ability—Robert Toombs. [Applause.] He enacted into the constitution of our State the direction to the legislature that they should pass laws to regulate freight rates. That was left to the legislature. The legislature met and appointed a commission in 1879. That commission originated rates. They took up the railroad rates of the State from A to Z and prescribed and fixed them. There was hurrying and scurrying in hot haste to find shelter, first, behind the circuit court of the United States. We find it in the Fifth Federal Reporter in the case of Tilley v. the Railroad Commission. They asserted that Georgia, through its legislature, had no right to delegate the power to a commission to fix a rate. A learned judge, who afterwards graced the Supreme Court of the United States—Judge Wood—rendered an able opinion on that subject, part of which I will put into my remarks, saying among other things:

> How a delegation of power to declare what is just and reasonable could be more plain and explicit is difficult to see. It is not conferred on the courts. The railroad companies have no part or lot in the decision of the question, but the constitution declares it is "hereby conferred on the general assembly." Even where there is no constitutional provision as that which exists in this State, it has been held that where property has been clothed with a public interest legislature may fix a limit to that which in law shall be reasonable for its use. This limit binds the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the legislature, not the court, must be appealed to to change it.

And discussing it further on:

> The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make the law which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law.

The supreme court of Georgia in the case which I hold in my hand upheld the power of the State to delegate this authority to a railroad commission.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to inquire if in the judgment of the gentleman there would be any distinction between the exercise of the power like that conferred upon the Georgia commission, in reference to the intrastate traffic and the exercise of power conferred upon a similar body in reference to interstate traffic?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think there is any difference, I will state to my friend, and for this reason: The right to regulate highways is a sovereign right, because the State gives life and being to the corporation. When they grant to a railroad the right of way upon the property of the citizens of the State, and the right to charge toll, the State has a right to exercise its sovereign powers to fix these tolls at a reasonable rate.

Now, you say to me that the United States Government does not grant charters to railroads, or to most of them, engaged in interstate business. The Government chartered the railroads known as the Pacific railroads, which span the country and connect the great East with the great West and Pacific slope. I apprehend that with reference to those there can be no doubt of the right of Congress to regulate the freight upon them—those great highways that have been given life, being, and existence by the power of Congress.

But I undertook to make myself understood when I said that Congress received the power from the people, not from the State, and I undertook to maintain by the authorities which I have cited and will undertake to maintain by the authorities which I will cite that whenever a railroad company or any company comes within the purview of the interstate commerce clause, whenever it engages in interstate business it becomes liable to that greatest sovereign, the United States Congress, to regulate and control it. It gets its power to regulate interstate commerce by the Constitution of the United States, which deprives the State of a right to regulate it, but lodges the power in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. In view of the question just asked the gentleman by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia in that connection if the Supreme Court, in the Maximum Rate Case, cited in 167 United States, did not decide that Congress had a right to create a commission and to give power contemplated in this bill to that commission?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir; but that it has not done.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is held in the Reagen case and in the Stone case that the State legislatures had the power to confer this rate, fixing the power upon the commission where the legislature had declared that the freight rates should be reasonable and just; that it could leave the administration of that law to a commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT. One moment. I have just undertaken to make myself clear, and I am sorry I did not to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. You did make yourself clear; but right in connection with what the gentleman from Texas had asked you I desired to ask you this question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will answer this way. I have all these decisions and I am endeavoring to read them. I have consumed a great deal of time to get them in brief and consecutive form, and I will undertake to give the House the benefit of it in the RECORD, if it is of any benefit to anybody. But I undertook to see this.

I got one case from my own State and traced it from the superior court there to the Supreme Court of the United States, thinking if I could find one case which would answer the demands made by the people upon its legislature that they should regulate the rates in the State of Georgia, and that that rate had been taken up both in the Federal and State court and had found itself finally through the regular channels at last in the greatest court—the Supreme Court of the United States—and that court had given sanction and approval to that rate, I was happy, indeed, in finding a decision that settled the case. That is what I have done. Mark you, do not be misled by the assertion that the States have this power in their legislature because the constitution of the State granted the power to create a commission. The constitution of Georgia did not give the legislature such power. It simply says, "Shall have the power to regulate and fix reasonable rates and freight charges."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Right there I would suggest to the gentleman, in reference to the Texas case, the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision sustained the commission law and never once referred to the constitution of the State of Texas, but put it upon the broad ground that the legislature of Texas had the inherent right to establish a railroad commission, not only to fix one rate, but to fix the great body of rates on all railroads in the State.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that to be the decision, and I have them referred to in this brief.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, in reference to the question the gentleman from Alabama asked you a while ago, I will ask you if it is not the fact that, in what is known as the Alabama Midland case, the Supreme Court did not reaffirm emphatically that Congress had the power to endow the Commission with authority to establish rates?

Mr. BARTLETT. They certainly did. I call attention to that case and give the views in Judge Harlan's dissenting opinion. I have already called attention to this case. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know the gentleman to be about as industrious as any man in this House when he undertakes to study a subject, and therefore I will ask him this question, Have you found a State or Federal decision that holds that railroad rates can not be regulated by a commission?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you read any author who has ever written a law book who has written to the contrary?

Mr. BARTLETT. Law books are so numerous and some of them so worthless that I have not undertaken to read all of them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Attorney-General of the United States agrees a commission can fix rates.

Now, then, another proposition. What is the difference in a railroad rate and a tax on real estate or personal property? Are they not both burdens and both taxes?

Mr. BARTLETT. One of them was received by the Government primarily itself, and the other by the road, as the agent of the Government, transacting its quasi public business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are they not both in effect taxes?

Mr. BARTLETT. They certainly tax the people very much.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, then, when they levy a tax on the real or personal property in your State, as they do in mine, they give the taxpayer a chance to go before the tax assessor before he finally taxes his property that the taxpayer may see the tax justly fixed. Now, is it not but just and fair to establish a tribunal of the people before which they can go to have railroad rates fixed before they have to pay them?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman must know that I answer that question in the affirmative.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to hear you discuss it if you have views in the matter.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think a railroad charge, Mr. Chairman, is exactly like a tax; because the State authorities, the county authorities, and the municipal authorities, through the power and sovereignty, directly for the purpose of transacting the public business, are supposed to collect no more than the budget for the year, that the needs of the people require; but the railroad company is authorized by law, by the sovereign, the people, which is the railroad primarily, says Judge Harlan, in a case that I might call attention to, primarily for the benefit of the people and for public service; secondly, with a view to permitting a remuneration to itself and the stockholders and those who invest their money in it. Judge Woods likens, in 5 Federal Reporter, which I have read, the delegation of power to State assessors to assess and collect taxes to the delegation of power to a commission to fix railroad rates. But all its service is a public service and not a private service, and in the exactions made upon the people who ship freight or travel over the railroad, the railroad company exacts its charge, not for the purpose simply of transacting its business so as to make expenditures and receipts meet but in order to tax the business as much generally as the traffic will bear.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in answer to my friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], I want to say that I have a number of authorities upon the subject that he has inquired of me about. I have numbers of cases here with reference to the power of the State to delegate its authority. I have here a decision in the One hundred and twenty-fifth Massachusetts and quite a number of others, which would take more time than I should like to undertake to consume, because I have already consumed more than I ought to.

Now, I undertake to say that it can not be successfully disputed from a legal standpoint that Congress has the power to regulate commerce, and in such regulation to reach those transportation companies which, though they may derive their charter from the State legislature, yet when they cross the border line and engage in interstate commerce, at once have attached to them the power of Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution; and that power once attaching for any purpose, can be exercised to the limit of the power, whether it be to regulate or whether it be to fix charges.

So, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say I have received quite a number of petitions from railroad employees in my town and district protesting against the enactment of this law. The resolutions seem to be machine made, but they have signed them. I have a number of them in my hand and I have filed them before the House and referred them to the proper committee. Their protest against the enactment of this law seems to be based upon the idea that Congress was undertaking to take out of the hands of railroads the right to make rates and confer it upon the Commission, and that if that was done the railroads would be compelled to reduce the wages of employees to a point which would be unjust to those employees. I have prepared certain tables upon the subjects of rates and tonnage, which I will print in full. But I want to make this statement: I do not desire to injure anybody; most of all would I be careful not to advocate any legislation that would injure the railroad employees, who, in my part of the country, at least, deserve to be ranked and classed amongst our best and truest citizens. They are the men who engage in carrying the great commerce and passenger traffic upon these great railroads. They devote their lives, their time, and their energy to that work. Their petitions deserve careful consideration at the hands of the lawmaker, and I shall always listen to their petitions.

But these men in Wall street who accumulate great wealth by the manipulation of railroad bonds, by the wrecking of railroad companies, and the squeezing out of the bona fide stockholders; who engage in the questionable, if not the nefarious, business of aiding the trustees of the great insurance companies to rob and plunder the policy holders, these men excite no sympathy in my breast when they appeal to me not to pass this legislation because, they say, it may affect their returns. But so far as the machinist, the carpenter, the engineer, the fireman, the conductor, the trainman, the man who keeps the switch are concerned—the men who by their labor make the transportation of these great railroads effective—they appeal to me in reference to matters which affect them they shall always have a careful hearing. I do not believe that the railroads will reduce the wages of their employees. I do not intend nor does this House expect to vote for a bill that gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to originate rates or to prescribe rates, except in cases where complaint is made and rates are found to be excessive, unjust, and unreasonable.

I know that when these railroad employees are informed and understand that these demands for railroad regulation are against the exactions of railroad corporations, against the oppression by them of their neighbors, they will not be driven from approving of that regulation because they are now threatened by the railroad corporations with a reduction of their wages. If the railroads are so careful to reduce the wages of employees when they shall be prohibited from charging exorbitant rates and are required to charge reasonable and just ones, why have not those same philanthropic employers advanced the wages of their employees when they increased the charges paid by the shippers and producers of this country since the year 1900 to such an extent that their receipts for freights and passengers have increased over 50 per cent, and their receipts from freights alone over 52 per cent? If the employees are to share in the reduction of freight rates, surely evenhanded justice would demand that they should also share in the increase of income to the railroads.

Now, they have increased their employees' wages, it is true, a small percentage. Let me call your attention to what they have done. I want the citizens who make these appeals to me at the suggestion of the railroad corporations who employ them—appeals to Members of Congress not to pass this legislation because it reduced their wages—to understand that their wages have not been increased, although the employers have prospered to the extent of adding to their receipts from freight more than 52 per cent in excess of that received five years ago.

Let us see. In 1895 the general officers—that is, the president, vice-president, and general manager, etc.—got $9.01 a day. In 1904 the general officers got $11.61 a day, an increase of 28.86 per cent. These men that ride in private cars and have all the luxuries of modern travel, increase their own pay from $9.01 a day to $11.61 a day, 28.86 per cent, when they had received an increase of 52 per cent over the freight and passenger receipts of 1885. But the employee—the engineer, the man who stands with his hand on the lever and his eye on the danger as he guides the great passenger and freight trains over these roads—what did he get? He got $3.65 in 1895, and under the great era of prosperity to the railroad he got $4.10, an increase of 45 cents, or 12.33 per cent.

The president, vice-president, superintendent—the general officers—got an increase of 28.86 per cent; the man who held his own life and the lives and property of the people who traveled behind him, depending upon his bravery, courage, and endurance, was not entitled to as much consideration as the general officers.

And, Mr. Chairman, how did these employees get it? I want them to understand how they got it. They know how they got it. Does not every man know—nobody knows better than the railroad people—the engineman, conductor, and fireman, and the machinist got their increase, not by the consent of the railroad, but by the demand of organized labor. They made the railroads consent to the increase, they forced them to the concession. It was not a great desire to let them share in the prosperity of the road as was the case of the general officers, it was because these same men organized this association and stood shoulder to shoulder and made the demand on the railroad, and in many instances were sanctioned in that demand by justice and right and by the approval of the people.

Let us take the poor switch tender, the crossing tenders, the switchman, the section foremen, and how did they fare? Why they got an increase of 2 cents per day, or 1.14 per cent. The poor office clerk who bent over his desk nearly twelve hours a day, got an increase of 1.37 per cent—3 cents a day.

So this is the great bogeyman that they have injected into this House through the means of these tried and true citizens who are employed by the railroad to undertake to frighten the representatives of the people from voting for the just demands of the people. It is in pursuance of such efforts as that that they have undertaken to declare that the South could not afford to vote for the railroad regulation because of the regulation of the Southern States in the transportation of passengers requiring a separation of the races; that that law will be thereby destroyed. How will it repeal the laws of a State which compel them to make separation of the races in the car? They resisted that law, but the States compelled them to observe it. Gentlemen who are familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court know that the railroads have undertaken and did undertake to defeat that law by saying that it was an interference of interstate commerce, and the Supreme Court of the United States decided that it was not as interference of interstate commerce. I refer to the case of Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company v. Mississippi (133 U. S. R., 587).

Mr. JAMES. That could not become effective because the traffic is wholly within the State.

Mr. BARTLETT. Wherever it is regulated it is regulated by law. Besides, it is but the exercise of the police power of the State, and so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is not a practice prescribed by the railroad. No one will undertake to say that a regulation made by law inside of a State would be regarded as a rate made by a railroad.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman will recollect that the railroads, after the Fifty-eighth Congress had passed a bill through the House, raised that question for the purpose of affecting Southern opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have the case here of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad against Mississippi, and the three decisions made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the only three cases that have arisen before them on the subject, and no change has been made in any State regulation on that subject.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman put those in the RECORD?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the gentleman covered the very point that I wished him to elucidate, every phase of it. In reference to the last proposition that he has announced in regard to the separate coaches, I will ask him if the Supreme Court has not often decided that such proposition is a matter purely within the jurisdiction of the State?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. In regard to the police powers.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And that the States had unlimited authority along that line in respect to their police powers.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and I will refer the gentleman to the case of the Louisville Railroad Company against Mississippi (133 U. S., pp. 85–87).

Mr. JAMES. I would like to state that a case similar to that was decided by the court of appeals of Kentucky, Judge Guffy, a Republican, rendering the opinion of the court, and that case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States and the Kentucky court was affirmed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and that the Supreme Court of the United States have knocked into smithereens all the efforts made by Congress to enact, after the civil war, what was known as a "civil-rights law." It has never departed from that position, and our Republicans, wherever they go down into the South where that rule is in force, I apprehend are glad of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have here a brief much fuller than I can undertake to deliver on the floor, and therefore I shall content myself with putting what I desire to say on the law question in the RECORD. I desire to say that, in my judgment, this bill, amended as it was originally—I do not mean this bill was amended, but the one originally introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]—by suggestions contained in a bill prepared by the minority and introduced by Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana, contains such substantial relief for the people upon this great question that I am unwilling to risk the chances of its becoming a law by endeavoring to write in certain provisions which I favor but which might endanger its final passage—make it more difficult for it to become a law. Now, in the minority bill we had this which was not contained in the majority bill, and which we put into this bill by the consent of the majority. We added these words:

> And shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary.

The majority bill contained this provision, which we never would have agreed to and could not have agreed to, that the railroad commission should have authority to fix "a maximum reasonable rate." We took the position that that meant a delegation of authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the highest rate that would be reasonable and to fix no other, and in that I think we were correct, and when we demonstrated, as I think we did, to the gentlemen of the majority that at least that might leave a doubtful question as to what construction would be placed upon it, they accepted our suggestion upon that point. This bill contains these words, which do not suit me, but which I consented to for the reasons already stated, that the railroad commission shall fix a just and reasonable and "fairly remunerative rate" as the maximum to be charged. I do not believe the bill should have contained the words "fairly remunerative," because that might be construed to mean, when it was attacked in the courts, that if the railroad commission did not take into consideration various investments of the railroad, the watered stock and bonds and these sort of things, it would not "be fairly remunerative."

In the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the two cases of Smythe v. Ames (169 U. S., 466) and of Sanford v. Interstate Commerce Commission (164 U. S., 578), Justice Harlan used this language in the first case:

> The railroad is organized primarily for the benefit of the public, and it must discharge its public function whether it receives a remunerative return for its investment or not.

And in the last case the same judge said:

> The public can not properly be subjected to unreasonable rates in order simply that the stockholders may earn dividends.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption at this time, I would like to ask him if he has not already stated it—for I have not heard all of his speech—what power in his judgment a court would have upon an appeal from the decision of the Commission fixing a rate? Could it set aside that rate unless it believed it to be confiscatory?

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope it can not.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not asking the gentleman for his hope, but for his opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope it can not, and if I could write it into this bill I would write it now and here and make it a part of the bill that the court could not set aside a decision of the Commission appointed by this Government unless that decision was unlawful—that is, confiscatory.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the gentleman's opinion, not his hope?

Mr. BARTLETT. My opinion is that the authority in this bill properly construed by the court will not permit it to set aside a rate unless it is unreasonably low, so low as not to permit a fair and reasonable return on the investment.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, unless it is confiscatory.

Mr. BARTLETT. I say if I was on the court I would so construe this bill. That is my attitude in writing it as it is, and if the minority bill had been passed we had it in so many words that there could be no doubt about. I take the position, as the Supreme Court has decided in 194 United States, page 106—Bates v. Payne—that when Congress delegates the power to an executive department to carry out its legislative will upon a question of fact that judgment ought to be conclusive on questions of fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman I am inclined to think that his judgment is right, though I differ entirely as to the wisdom of such a law.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope it is right, and when that is done and a decision shall ever be reached, as in my judgment it will be, that a railroad can not appeal from this judgment or a decision of this railroad commission which has exercised a function granted to them by us, that they shall decide that an appeal can not be had to set aside a rate unless it is so low as to be unreasonable, in that it takes property without just compensation, then this railroad situation will be very properly settled. They have taken the property of the citizen many times when it amounted almost to confiscation, and there has not been any power to stay their rapacity, and for one I believe it is time that our citizens should have the power to stay them from taking their property longer. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand the gentleman thinks that because they have taken property from the citizen wrongfully, therefore the Commission should have the power to take from them?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not at all. The gentleman knows I did not mean any such thing, and the gentleman knows that he can not put me in any such position as that. He knows I do not thing we ought to rob the railroads because they have been permitted and licensed to rob the people. I do mean to say that if we, as a legislative body, should take this whole rate system up and enact rates to-day and pass them and promulgate them, that the railroads would be obliged to obey them unless we took away property without just compensation, or which would be confiscatory.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it is true they would be compelled to obey them, but I do not think it follows that we ought to make such a law.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to confiscate anybody's property, and I made the remark I did because I am unwilling in determining the question of rates as to their reasonableness or unreasonableness, that the Commission shall be expected or required to take into consideration all the watered stocks and bonds, and these railroad corporations shall be permitted to make a return. In other words, with thirteen and one-quarter billions of property ostensibly invested there is not more than seven billions really invested.

Mr. HARDWICK. May I ask my colleague a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. As I understand the Constitution of the United States, authority is delegated to Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, it being true that the authority is delegated to Congress, why is it not also true that Congress itself, or its duly appointed agent—the Commission—should have the final power to pass on the question of facts instead of the Supreme Court, which is not given that power under the Constitution?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not see why they should not have, and they should have the power; I would give it to them.

Mr. HARDWICK. And you understand this bill does give it to them?

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope it does, and I believe it does. I voted for it believing it does.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one other question now. Is it not in accordance with the theory of our Government laid down in the Constitution that the final passing upon these questions of facts suggested by my friend from Kentucky should be vested in the Congress of the United States and not in the courts of the United States?

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course it is understood to be a legislative and not a judicial question, and can not be delegated to a judicial body, and therefore all this talk in the newspapers about the Grosscup plan, the Foraker plan, and all these plans to have commerce courts to which these questions are to be delegated, are nothing but red fire to hide the farce. That is all.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not historically true that the provision in the Constitution giving Congress power to regulate commerce among the States was put into the Constitution for the purpose at that time of preventing the States, by discriminatory laws, interfering with the commerce of sister States?

Mr. BARTLETT. I undertook to read something of that sort from Judge Marshall, Judge Story, and Judge Johnson this morning, and also read the case in 83 United States, the Philadelphia case, and I have a number of cases where that fact as stated is true. But when the power exists now and was delegated, and should have been delegated, to this great body to regulate commerce amongst the States, or its vehicles or its transportation through their own borders when it came from another State, sad, indeed, for the liberties and rights of the people if it shall be held and determined to be true that it lodges nowhere, and that the greatest sovereign on the face of the earth, the people of the United States and its Congress, are powerless and must stand and see its citizens stripped, robbed, and plundered by soulless combinations, of soulless corporations, and railroad monopolies because the fathers were not wise enough to see how exorbitant, grasping, and heedless of both the laws of the State and the moral laws they would grow to be.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, nobody doubts the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, even to the extent of prohibiting it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have those decisions.

Mr. SHERLEY. But I object to the inference which was drawn by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. HARDWICK], that because that clause was put in there it was contemplated we would use the power in interfering with the freedom of commerce between the States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have the decisions here and have read them. If we can prohibit commerce and destroy it as we did under the Administration of Mr. Madison, in the embargo and in the alien laws—if we can prohibit, if we can destroy it—in God's name can not we exercise the pitiful power to regulate it? [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. The fact of having the right to exercise it has really nothing to do with the wisdom of exercising it. That is the question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am afraid I have spent all of this time in vain if I have not succeeded in showing that to my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], whom no man admires more than I do for his legal ability and information. But inasmuch as my distinguished friend at last admits that, inasmuch as we have the power of a giant and ought to use it, it is something accomplished, to say the least. We have the power, but I would not use it to destroy property or interstate commerce. I would not use it to injure the property of even these men in Wall street; but I would use it so that they should not injure and destroy the property of my people in Georgia. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Everybody will agree with that expression of ethics. The question is whether any given act works that way or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Whether the given act works that way or not, we are simply to be taught by experience. Take up the petitions that have come from over the country, from the various meetings of the people, of the merchants and of boards of trade, addressed to Congress and to the President himself, and do not tell me that it amounts to nothing; that it is merely as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. There is something in it. The people are slow, but when they have made up their minds, as they have, that they should not submit to wrong, they have voiced that determination and its thunders have been heard in every State in political campaigns in the last few years, and it will be heard again in the campaign of this year, and it will be heard two years from now. In my judgment, the men who stand in the way of this reform should either get out of the way or they will be swept into political oblivion.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that two-thirds of the States of this Union have passed laws regulating railroads so far as they can within the borders of their respective States?

Mr. BARTLETT. They have, and they have been upheld by the Supreme Court. Take the Minnesota case, the Ohio case, the Texas case, the Mississippi case, and the Georgia case.

Mr. JAMES. And the Kentucky case. Do not leave that out.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will not.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman permit one interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, if the gentleman will be short about it.

Mr. STANLEY. In speaking of the wisdom of this legislation I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the necessity for it, the absolute ruin that is being brought to commerce for the lack of it, is not the principal cause why we have not obtained it at all, and that the necessity for it rises above political barriers and everything else?

Mr. BARTLETT. The necessity for it is that the people have awakened to the realization that Congress has not done something that everybody thought was done. The point was made simply to reclothe—and if you object to that word, to "clothe"—and renew to the Commission the power that we thought we bestowed upon it—a power that it ought to have, namely, the right to change an unreasonable rate and substitute in its place a reasonable one.

This bill will place the private car lines under the supervision and regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, just as it does the railroads upon which they are operated. This power is included in the bill by the definition which is given to the term "transportation," that word being so defined as to include these agencies engaged in interstate commerce. While I am aware of the fact that these private car lines have been of great benefit in the matter of the shipment of fruit from my section, I am also aware that many complaints have come from the fruit growers in reference to the excessive charges that have been made. I would not injure this business, nor am I at all fearful that this legislation will prevent the fruit growers, and those who ship their produce by the private car lines, from having proper facilities. This bill makes it compulsory upon the railroads to furnish the necessary cars and facilities, but it does not, of course, prevent the railroads from contracting with private car lines for the necessary equipment by which to transport such products. It simply places the charges exacted from the shipper by both the railroad and the private car lines under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that when complaint is made an investigation can be had as to the reasonableness of such charges.

As early as 1874 a report was made to Congress in which attention was called to the practices of the private car lines, and in 1902 the Industrial Commission, in its report to Congress, called attention to the abuses of the private car lines, stating that "these private car line combinations have been able to dictate to the railroads and to the people their own terms."

The Fruit Growers' Association of Georgia met in the city of Macon on January 26th, instant, and passed a resolution unanimously requesting the Members of Congress to pass a bill enlarging the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to include all private car lines, and also recommending the passage of the bill now under consideration. In that convention a fruit shipper stated that two years ago he had shipped eighty-five carloads of peaches and had been compelled to pay $25,000 for transportation and charges, and that Georgia in the same year had paid one and a third million dollars for shipping peaches. Surely, when such great sums are collected from the people, the power should be lodged somewhere to inquire into the reasonableness of the charges.

In that same convention a representative of the Armour interests, that control the private car systems which operate in Georgia, said that he did not particularly oppose the Hepburn bill, or a mere regulation bill, but opposed other bills before Congress which called for the prohibition of the use of the private car systems.

So that representatives of these great private car lines themselves have virtually admitted before the fruit growers of my section that these car lines ought to be regulated, or at least they offered no opposition to it in that convention.

As to the duty of a common carrier to provide suitable cars for transportation, there has been many decisions of the courts which hold and sustain the right of the shipper to recover damages from the railroads when they fail to transport freight in proper cars. (See Mathis v. Sou. Rwy. Co., 30 Am. and Eng. Rwy. Cases, 825; Railroad Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wallace, 123.)

The power of Congress to regulate private car lines and their business and all the agencies used by them in transporting, refrigerating, or icing, in my judgment, is complete under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and although some of these agents, instrumentalities, or businesses connected with this transportation may be in private hands, yet, under the decision on the case reported in 175 United States, page 211, and known as the "Addyston Pipe Case," Congress has the power to regulate these, because they engage in interstate commerce when they aid or assist in the transportation of freight being carried on interstate-commerce lines.

There can be no doubt that if the private car lines should by reason of this act decline to continue in the business, the railroads will gladly undertake it, and under this bill they will be compelled to furnish the necessary cars for transportation. The Chicago and Rock Island Railroad Company in January, 1905, discontinued its contracts with the private car lines, at which time it had only 259 special ventilated cars, including fruit cars, and on January 1, 1906, it had 1,754, and is transporting, to the satisfaction of its patrons, the fruits and other freight requiring special cars and facilities; and there is no doubt that the other railroads in the country will do likewise. So no injury can come to the shipper who has been accustomed heretofore to use these private car lines from the passage of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say this and then I am through. I do not agree that the legislation now proposed is entitled to be credited to any particular man or official of the United States. On many occasions I have seen it asked by the public press whether the Democrats are going to stand by the President in his fight on this proposition? I am not following the President; I am following the dictates of my own conscience; I am following where I see the right lead, and I am following the demands of the great party to which I belong as made in its platforms in 1896, 1900, and 1904. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Why, sir, Congress took up this question in 1868, again in 1874, again in 1886, and in 1900 Congress appointed the Industrial Commission, and for two years it labored and heard all the evidence on this question, and it reported recommending the enactment of a law of this sort before the President of the United States had awakened up to a realization that it was a popular question to answer so great a demand of the people of the United States.

This investigation began in 1868, when there was made to the House a report, from one of its committees, Committee on Railways and Canals, a report declaring that Congress had the power and should regulate interstate railroad traffic and provide for uniform and equitable rates of transportation. This was in the Fortieth Congress. Again in the Forty-third Congress we had a report made to the Senate on the subject by Senator Windom, which asserted the right of Congress to regulate interstate railroad rates. And in 1886 we have the report made by Mr. Reagan, reporting a bill for this purpose which finally resulted in the enactment of the law providing for the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the powers contained in the act of February 4, 1887.

Since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring the absence of power in the Commission, the question has been constantly agitated. In February, 1902, the Industrial Commission, a body of gentlemen appointed in 1900 by authority of Congress, made a report, after being in session two years, and recommended "a definite grant of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon the reasonableness of interstate-railroad charges, and also a definite grant of power to declare a given rate unreasonable, together with the power to prescribe reasonable rates in substitution."

Following the recommendation of the Industrial Commission, bills were introduced in the House having for their object the giving of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a reasonable rate to be substituted in the place of one found to be unreasonable.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin introduced such a bill on the 8th of December, 1903, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Quarles] introduced a similar bill in the Senate on the 12th of December, 1903. My colleague [Mr. ADAMSON] also introduced a bill to give the Commission the power to fix rates in the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and other bills of like character had been pending in Congress, and hearings had been had before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee nearly two years before the President made it so prominent in his message in December, 1904, and in 1905.

Even now some of the railroad presidents claim that the President has receded from his original position on this subject, so that I am not following the President. I am following the dictates of my own conscience, the demands of my own people, and the demands of my own party platforms. Why, it is charged by some of the newspapers that we have joined ourselves to the socialists and the anarchists; that we have abandoned the doctrine of State rights in advocating this proposition. The governor of Georgia was elected upon a platform that I have read here to-day. Strange, three railroad lawyers and one railroad director were upon that committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Upon the subcommittee.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think I have got it right. I will give the names: Evan Howell; John D. Little, ex-speaker of the house; Judge Hamilton McWhirter, Morris Brandon——

Mr. ADAMSON. Two of them on the subcommittee.

Mr. BARTLETT. These gentlemen constituted part of the committee on platforms and aided in drafting and reporting these resolutions. John D. Little was the ex-speaker of the house of representatives, attorney at law for one of the great systems of railroads, a lawyer, and a good man. Judge Hamilton McWhirter, chief advisory counsel of the Southern Railroad, was upon that committee and upon the subcommittee that reported that platform.

Mr. ADAMSON. If my colleague will permit me right now to say, that in answer to that demand the Georgia delegation, through myself, immediately drafted and introduced a bill to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rates. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I know you did—in December, 1902. Now, when the representatives of the sovereign people of the State of Georgia, answering the demands of the people of the districts, answering the demands of our party, made known through its convention and endorsed by these railroad lawyers and directors; when we undertake to aid the people with our votes for this great reform, it has been charged that we have forgotten the teachings of the fathers and are undertaking to destroy private property, violate State rights, and that we have joined the anarchists. Why, if a railroad lawyer and the chief advisory counsel of the Southern Railway, Mr. Hamilton McWhirter, could report to the State convention and vote for a resolution that demanded this legislation, why can not a humble man like the Representatives of Georgia—myself and my colleague—do so likewise without subjecting ourselves to criticisms at the hands of railroad lawyers and railroad newspapers? [Loud applause.] For myself, I am indifferent to their criticism, because I obey the dictates of my conscience, the demands of my people, and the demands of my party. [Loud applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, we have stated what we stood for. We had it stated in the Democratic convention in 1896. We had a real sure-enough knock-down and drag-out fight in 1896. Those of us who took part in it know what it meant. A platform that read like a second declaration of independence was the platform adopted by the Democratic party in 1896. [Applause.] Upon it we placed our nominee, a leader who, though he was defeated then and again in 1900, stands before this country to-day, before the world, as the most prominent and preeminent citizen of America. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] And we made this declaration in that platform:

We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and such restriction and guarantees for the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

And again, in 1900:

We favor an enlargement of the scope of the interstate-commerce law as will enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect individuals and communities from discriminations and the public from unjust and unfair transportation rates.

Again, in 1904:

We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the traveling public and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief from the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation.

How strangely turns the wheel of time. We stand to-day hardly ten years, six years, and two years since these great principles of the Democratic party were proclaimed by its national conventions, advocated by the people and supported by the followers of that party. True, they went down like the others to temporary defeat, but above the smoke and dust of the political battle they rise triumphant, until to-day we have them about to be incorporated into law, voted for by both the Republican and the Democratic Members of the House. They may not have been successful in the election of Democratic officials, but the Republican party have been forced by the people's demand to give their votes for the relief that we demanded in those platforms.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not further true that the Republican platform of 1896 and the Republican national platforms of 1900 and 1904 were all silent upon this great question of the regulation of railroads?

Mr. BARTLETT. They were as silent as the body of Cæsar now is, and as idle and useless "as a painted ship upon a painted ocean."

Mr. ADAMSON. One suggestion there.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. In 1904 they were not silent, but the Republican platform indulged in an expression allaying the apprehensions of the corporations by boasting that they had done enough and fixed everything up.

Mr. JAMES. That was the "stand-pat" idea.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have agreed to the bill now before the House being presented by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce because it grants substantial relief which the people have sought and demanded, and which the Democratic party in its platforms has called for—that is, giving the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate a rate upon complaint, and, when found to be unreasonable, to fix a reasonable one in its stead, and while there are other matters which, in my judgment, required correction and legislation, I was not willing to lose the substance of this relief by grasping at a shadow. In other words, I was not willing to be put in the position of refusing to support and join in reporting a bill which gave the people substantial relief, simply because it was advocated by a Republican President or introduced by a Republican Congressman, believing that when I served my country and its people best I served my party best.

To paraphrase the language of a great Georgian, who by his eloquence and ability honored the great State which he represented upon this floor and in the Senate:

He who saves his country saves his party, and all things saved do bless him. He who lets his country die lets his party die, and all things dying curse him.

[Applause.]

It is true that the fate of this bill in the other branch of Congress, when it has passed the House, is uncertain. A leading banker and broker of Wall street, on the 13th of this month, in a published statement, said:

The railroad situation continues eminently satisfactory, and there is little, if any, prospect of railroad legislation during the present session of Congress, chiefly owing to the conflict of opinion between the numerous advocates of reform. So far as can be seen, Wall street is not likely to receive any serious shock via Washington during the current session.

Whether the railroad magnates and railroad stock manipulators will have their expectations and hopes gratified by the failure of this legislation, I do not know; whether this bill, when it shall have been passed by an almost unanimous House, shall go to the Senate, there to "lie in cold abstraction and to rot," I know not.

I fear that it may meet the fate that many bills of this House for the relief of the people have met—to be buried in the tomb of the Senate committee or the Senate Chamber. But this I do believe, that there will some day be an end to this defeat of the will of the people. I believe that the "Waters of truth will rise gradually and slowly, but surely, and then look out for the overflowing scourge."

Balked in its just demands for remedial legislation and to be relieved from oppression and injustice, this mighty and puissant nation will yet rouse itself up, like a strong man after sleep, and shake her invincible locks in a fashion you little think of now.

Retribution will come in due time. While justice travels with a leaden heel, it is sure to strike with an iron hand. While the mills of the gods grind slowly, they grind exceedingly fine.

The wrath of the people will yet lift the flood gates, and a full head of waters will come rushing on. If we wait until that time we will see fine grinding then.

Defeat this legislation and the people will rise in their might and be triumphant. The man or party that stands in its way will be swept out of their path. Wall street may not this year or during this Congress receive any shock by reason of the passage of this bill, or one like it, which carries relief to the people. If so, if it should fail, let all the railroad rings and magnates and financiers rejoice, for this is their day; the people's day is to come. At least, let this House do its duty to the people, do its part toward enacting this bill into law, and the people will say, "Amen!" [Prolonged applause.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2012. An act granting an increase of pension to William Wilson.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield sixty minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, it is unusual in the history of legislation that any public measure has behind it so strong and united a public sentiment as that which is supporting this bill. It is doubtful, I think, whether this united sentiment could exist in any country except our own. It is certain that it could not exist in any time other than the time in which we are living. These facilities of transportation and communication with which we are now so familiar are all of comparatively recent origin. For thousands of years, until within a very recent time, there were absolutely no changes in the methods and modes of transportation or communication. When George Washington desired to send a quick message into the interior, he employed precisely the same methods that were employed by the Pharaohs of Egypt—a footman or a man on horseback. To-day all that is changed. The happenings of every day are known instantly all over the world. The daily paper reaches the farmer and the man in the workshop. To-day almost everybody is informed upon great public questions.

And so it is that great reforms under these conditions may be brought about in a few years which, under the old methods, would require decades, and perhaps centuries, to realize. I believe that the united public sentiment back of this legislation is due in a large measure to the strong and trusted personality of the President of the United States. The people of this time, regardless of political affiliation, have learned to trust the judgment and believe in the policies of Theodore Roosevelt. And while the committee is to be congratulated that they have agreed upon the measure that they are here reporting without a dissenting voice, that is, in fact, but an epitome or illustration of the united sentiment of the people of the whole country upon this class of legislation.

While the question of rate regulation of the great transcontinental railways is a complicated and difficult question to comprehend in all of its parts, nevertheless our people, as a rule, understand full well the simple principle involved, and they believe in that principle. That principle is that the great instrumentalities of commerce, whether a common carrier or a great corporation engaging in the interstate commerce of the country, shall be brought under Federal regulation and control.

For my own part, I believe that the particular provision of this bill giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix maximum rates when a given rate is challenged as unjust or unreasonable, while it is an important provision, is not the most important provision in the bill; and, speaking from the standpoint of one representing the transcontinental West, that part of our country west of the Mississippi River, I very much doubt, if this were the only provision in the bill, whether it would in its workings operate to the advantage and betterment of that particular part of our country. I believe I should still support the measure because of the principle of supervisory control in the Federal Government that is involved.

But, to my mind, much greater and more important are the provisions providing for a quick and ready means of relief against rebates, discriminations, private-car abuses, excessive icing charges, unreasonable terminal charges, and elevator abuses. These are really the far greater class under which the people of the entire country, the small shippers, are complaining; and if this bill—which I hope it will—can afford a means of relief, will minimize the injuries that are coming to the common shipping public by reason of these abuses, it will be a move in the right direction.

I do not regard this measure in any sense as legislation adverse to the railroads of the country.

In a broad sense I believe what is for the benefit of the people at large is for the benefit of the railroads. Some of the railroads of the country are endeavoring to obey the law. The purpose of this bill is to require that all must obey the law. The Administration policy for the regulation of great corporations as instrumentalities of interstate commerce is only the gospel of the square deal as applied to commerce. The square deal injures nobody that is deserving of consideration. The square deal benefits all honest and well-disposed citizens or corporations alike. The square deal is like Shakespeare's quality of mercy, which—

> Droppeth like the gentle rain from heaven
> Upon the place beneath; it is twice bless'd,
> It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes.

By far the greater offender against our present salutary laws for the regulation of commerce, in my opinion, is not commonly the railroad corporation or the small shipper. The great offender is the large shipper, the organized, gigantic trust that stands between the railroad company on the one hand and the common public on the other, acting the part of the commercial highwayman, holding up the common carrier for special privileges, rebates, and advantages over the small shipper, by means of which it grows monopolistic, while on the other hand it exacts exorbitant prices for its commodities from the general public because it has the power to do so.

I believe that in the very near future the Congress of the United States must pass beyond the step we are taking to-day for the affirmative regulation of the common carrier and take at least one step further and provide for the proper regulation by affirmative legislation of those great corporations engaging in interstate commerce which are not themselves common carriers. The President of the United States from the time of his first message to the Fifty-seventh Congress has uniformly embodied in his communications to Congress some recommendations along the line of the regulation of all corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. I will attach to my remarks extracts from the various messages of the President upon this subject. For the purposes of this discussion at this time I will simply read a short extract from the speech of the President, delivered at Chatauqua, N. Y., in August, 1905, as embodying what, to my mind, is the strongest and most direct statement of the relief that we may be expected to ask against the evils growing out of the trust and its operations in interstate commerce. He says:

> The enormous increase in interstate trade resulting from the industrial development of the last quarter of a century makes it proper that the Federal Government should, so far as may be necessary to carry into effect its national policy, assume a degree of administrative control over these great corporations. It may well be that we shall find that the only effective way of exercising this supervision is to require all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to produce proof satisfactory, say, to the Department of Commerce, that they are not parties to any contract or combination or engaged in any monopoly in interstate trade in violation of the antitrust law, and that their conduct on certain other specific points is proper; and, moreover, that these corporations shall agree, with a penalty of forfeiture of their right to engage in such commerce, to furnish any evidence of any kind as to their trade between the States whenever so required by the Department of Commerce.

The Commissioner of Corporations, in his last report, which was made public only two or three weeks ago, upon this precise subject has this to say:

> The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce being plenary, that body may determine to what extent it will first exercise its power. The transportation companies most clearly should come within the terms of such a measure; and with them should be joined the greater corporations engaged in the production, manufacture, and distribution of those staples which affect the lives of the people of this country and the monopolization of which will necessarily result in hardship and injustice to the individual.

Now, consistent with this idea, but upon my own initiative primarily, I prepared and introduced into this House upon the first day of this present session a bill for the regulation of corporations engaged in interstate commerce in food and fuel supplies, and as germane to this present discussion, if not directly involved in it, it is my purpose to devote the balance of the time allotted to me in this present debate to a consideration of the provisions and the principles involved in such proposed legislation. The bill to which I refer, right in line with the President's suggestion as to the supervision by the Department of this class of corporations, provides, first, that after January 1, 1907, all corporations engaging in interstate commerce in food and fuel supplies shall first obtain from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor a franchise or license authorizing the corporation to engage in such interstate business. It is provided that as a condition precedent to obtaining the license or franchise of that kind the corporation shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that it is not overcapitalized; that it has not entered into any contract or combination in restraint of interstate trade; that it is not operating, and that it is not its purpose to operate in violation of the antimonopoly laws of our statutes.

It is provided further that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall receive from corporations engaged in business of this kind annually and at such other times as he may require a detailed statement of the condition of such corporations and their methods of doing business. It is also provided that special examiners may be from time to time appointed to examine into the business methods and the general condition of such corporations, being in the nature of the examinations already had by the General Government in relation to national banks.

I begin with food and fuel corporations because we must begin somewhere. It is appropriate also to regulate first those great corporations that are handling the universal necessities of life, free commerce in which has always been considered a question of public policy.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is it your idea that because the product of the manufacturing establishment becomes an article of interstate commerce therefore the manufacturing establishment is engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. MARTIN. Not necessarily, by any means. The manufacturing establishment within the boundaries of a State—and every establishment must have a situs somewhere—may be manufacturing for the purpose of State commerce, or commerce within the State, and also for the purpose of commerce without the State. At just what particular instant articles manufactured within a given State become articles of interstate commerce, is not entirely clear under the authorities, each case being determined, to some extent, upon the particular facts involved in it. I may say, further, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the suggestion raised by the question of the gentleman brings what, to my mind, is an important reason why it is better to adopt a plan something like the one I am suggesting for the regulation of corporations by a franchise or license system, rather than to require national incorporation.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman know, in substance, all the corporations and all the private individuals who are engaged in the manufacture of any kind of commodity—for example, here is a sugar refinery establishment, and a tobacco factory in Louisville, or any other establishment of that sort, and these articles and products of the establishment or institution will become articles of interstate commerce—now, does it follow, therefore, that that corporation or that local institution is engaged in interstate commerce, in your judgment?

Mr. MARTIN. It does not follow that it is. If, as a matter of fact, it is engaged in interstate commerce it will come within the provisions of this bill if passed.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. If that is true, will not your bill embrace all manufacturing establishments in the country?

Mr. MARTIN. My bill does not embrace all the manufacturing establishments in the country, but a bill might be drawn along the same lines that would so provide if they are engaged in interstate commerce. My bill provides only for the regulation of corporations engaged in interstate commerce in particular lines of industry.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But the engagement in interstate commerce consists in the transportation of those articles from one State to the other. Is that right?

Mr. MARTIN. In a large part.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Well, therefore, if any article of a manufacturing establishment becomes a subject of interstate commerce, then that establishment would become engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. MARTIN. Most certainly; I think that is logical and inevitable.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I just wanted to catch the gentleman's idea.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Your bill provides that corporations engaged in interstate commerce should take out license or cease to do business?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir; after January 1, 1907, provided they are engaged in interstate commerce in these particular lines of industry—food and fuel supplies.

Mr. PALMER. What advantage would the corporations obtain by taking out a license?

Mr. MARTIN. They would have the advantage of continuing business in interstate commerce, which is certainly a great advantage. The interstate commerce of this country is by far the largest commerce in the world. It is a privilege granted simply by acquiescence. These corporations organize and exist under the laws of the various States.

Mr. PALMER. Would the license enable the corporation to do business in any State of the Union irrespective of State laws?

Mr. MARTIN. It would enable it to do business and authorize it to do business in interstate commerce no matter what State it went into, but it would not authorize it to do business within the boundaries of a State unless that business pertained to interstate commerce.

Mr. PALMER. It would not undertake to regulate interstate business?

Mr. MARTIN. It only undertakes to regulate corporations engaged in interstate-commerce business.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose the case of a manufacturing company located in the State and chartered under the laws of the State, doing a domestic business and also a foreign business. What advantage would such a corporation as that gain by taking out a license?

Mr. MARTIN. Simply this: If this bill were to become a law, it could continue its State business without a license. It would be barred from interstate business unless it took out a license.

Mr. PALMER. Then the gentleman's bill provides that no company engaged in business in the United States can do an interstate business unless it takes out this Federal license?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir; if it is engaged in these particular lines of industry, supplying the people with food and fuel.

Mr. PALMER. Why would it not be better to require the corporation doing the interstate business to take out a charter under some Federal corporation act?

Mr. MARTIN. There are difficulties along that line that do not apply to regulating corporations organized under the various States.

Mr. PALMER. What are they?

Mr. MARTIN. One of them is this: Of course if we were to require from the corporation doing an interstate business that instead of obtaining its charter from the State it should obtain it from the General Government, the question arises as a serious one of law, I think, as to the authority of the Government to authorize a corporation to carry on the business of producing within the boundaries of a State. A corporation can not produce simply theoretically and out in the atmosphere. And if it locates its establishment in the boundaries of a State, for all purposes, except that of interstate commerce, it is subject to the laws and the taxing powers of that State. I think difficulties arise along that line that do not arise as applied to the license——

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman think that Congress has the right to regulate commerce and could extend the right?

Mr. MARTIN. Most certainly. But will the gentleman bear in mind that the authority given in the commerce clause of the Constitution is not to create commerce, but to regulate it? And where the production of a commodity is the first exercise of authority to be given to a corporation, the question might properly arise as to whether the creation of the corporation is, in fact, the regulation of commerce or the creation of commerce itself by making instrumentalities by which the commodities of commerce could be produced.

Now, I must ask the gentlemen if they will forbear at present, as my time is limited. I would like to discuss this further.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. There is just one question I would like to ask. Did not the Supreme Court of the United States, in the sugar-refining case and in a number of other cases, expressly hold in the plainest possible language that the fact that the corporation manufactured products to be used in interstate commerce did not make that corporation engage in interstate commerce?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir. In the Knight case it was so held by the Supreme Court of the United States, which is quite in line with my argument.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. In the pipe-line case the territory was divided up and one part assigned to one territory and another to another territory.

Mr. MARTIN. Unless a corporation has authority to produce or manufacture within a State, or wherever the place of its habitation or its plant may be, it has no basis of engaging in commerce anywhere.

Now, without declining to answer questions, let me request of the gentleman that for a time I be permitted to proceed.

I was citing further the provisions of this bill. I am in hopes that this subject-matter may be up in the near future for consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where the bill is referred, and that later on it may be before this House for its deliberate action. My purpose at the present time is rather to begin a discussion along this line and to attract public attention to this necessary legislation rather than to exhaust the discussion to-day. Now, it is provided in this bill that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, if a corporation engaged in interstate business in these particular lines of industry shall fail to make its annual report or shall decline to make such other special report that may be exacted of it by the Secretary from time to time, he will have the authority to suspend temporarily the license of such corporation until it shall comply with the statute upon that subject.

It is further provided that after obtaining the license or franchise to engage in interstate commerce of this kind a subsequent violation of our antitrust laws shall subject such corporation to a forfeiture of its license and right to carry on interstate business. The act is to be enforced by the Attorney-General and district attorneys of the United States under his direction in the courts, and in such proceeding a decree may be rendered dissolving the right of such corporation to continue in the transaction of such interstate business. Severe penalties are provided for transacting business in these commodities without obtaining license. Beyond all that, by a principle similar to the remedy that we invoke for smuggling or the unlawful importing of goods into the United States from a foreign country, it is provided that if the outlaw corporations shall persist in transacting interstate commerce in food or fuel supplies without license or franchise to that effect, they shall forfeit the goods so unlawfully engaged in that commerce.

Now, I think it must appear from the mere statement of the provisions of this proposed legislation that its chief purpose is to enforce a compliance with our laws as they now exist upon the statute books. To the corporation that complies with the laws there is no peril or danger. To the corporation that does not the penalties are so severe as to make the law effective. Our internal commerce is by far the greatest commerce in the world. The foreign commerce of all the nations of the world is insignificant in comparison with the interstate commerce that these corporations are engaged in at home. To deny to the great corporations the privilege or right to engage in this commerce would be a most severe penalty. They would have left upon their hands great plants that could not be operated profitably within the boundaries of a single State alone. These great concerns are organized for a profit. Make it unprofitable to violate our wholesome antimonopoly laws and they will cease to do so.

Mr. PALMER. Suppose that a corporation seeking a license under your law, the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, or whatever it is, should find that it was a monopoly and the license should be refused, what would become of the company and its property?

Mr. MARTIN. It would be able to go to a court under a proceeding of mandamus or something of the kind, to compel the issuance of a license, and if it could establish conclusively the facts making it a lawful corporation of course the license would follow.

Mr. PALMER. But suppose that they were overcapitalized, they would have to go out of business because they could not get a license.

Mr. MARTIN. That would be the logical conclusion.

Mr. PALMER. It would be a bankrupt act, so far as they are concerned.

Mr. MARTIN. Now, in this connection I desire to discuss, in the time remaining to me, briefly some of the propositions involved in this legislation and the conditions in the country that, to my mind, make legislation of this character necessary. The rise and domination of the trusts present one of the most striking facts in modern commerce; and it is really the gigantic trust—the outlaw corporations—that it is the purpose of this bill to reach. Personally I have no quarrel with corporations in general. I recognize that corporations are necessary instrumentalities of our commerce.

We are living in this twentieth century, in the age of industry, and the strongest and deepest industrial currents in the world are to be found right here in the United States. The growth of the United States in wealth since the close of the civil war presents the most marvelous picture of prosperity and material progress of all the world. There is nothing in fiction or history that compares with it. In the development of our industries it is neither strange nor alarming that old methods and old implements have, in a large measure, been crowded out, making way for the new. The big corporations and little corporations have sprung into existence in this marvelous march of material progress as naturally as the steam engine or the cotton gin, which are material factors in our progress.

The trust problem is a much more modern problem than we sometimes stop to think. Epitomized in few words, the trust is a combination of corporations. In the United States we have advanced to a place where we do not fear anything simply because it is large; but here has come within the past ten years the adaptation of a principle by which competitors by consolidation can, over night, if you please, absolutely change and control conditions in commerce in any particular industry. It is this principle of combination, of sudden amalgamaton, that is, to my mind, the chief vice of this system. To-day there may be ten corporations that have developed along the line of natural, healthful corporate growth in any particular industry. Take the meat industry for an illustration. These corporations may be wholesome and sharp competitors in that business, and their competition insures to the general public the probability of a fair, and only a fair, price on that commodity. But by this principle of sudden consolidation these ten competing concerns may amalgamate their interests, and as a result all competition in that line of industry disappears at once, and to-morrow, as a result, these ten independent companies become one, with no consideration before them except their own profit and forgetful of the interests of the general public. It is this principle of sudden consolidation which is the genius and peculiarity of the trust which I am criticising, and which, in my judgment, as legislators sooner or later we must check.

I have said that the rise of this class of great corporations is new. A period of seven or eight years would reach back over the coming of almost all of them. The American Sugar Refining Company—the sugar trust—and the first Standard Oil Company were organized a little earlier than that, but the first Standard Oil Company was dissolved by the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio, and it reorganized under a new system in 1899. During that year a perfect spasm of consolidation and reorganization swept over the country and effected a consolidation of almost all the important lines of our commerce. Mr. John Moody, of New York, has during the past year published a work entitled "The Truth About the Trusts." In that work he gives the names of 318 industrial trusts with a combined capital of $7,000,000,000. These 318 industrial trusts represent what were before the consolidation 5,288 independent concerns. The largest of these consolidated concerns is what is known as the "steel trust"—the United States Steel Corporation. It has a nominal capitalization of $1,370,000,000. Notwithstanding this immense capitalization, it is probably true that the Standard Oil trust is, after all, the chief of the trusts. The nominal capital of the Standard Oil Company is only $97,500,000, but its shares have ranged in the market all the way from $580 to $830 per share in the past three years, representing an actual value of something like $650,000,000. It is stated on good authority that the net profits per year of the Standard Oil Company are about $60,000,000, or in the neighborhood of 61 per cent on the actual capitalization of that company.

Now, this spasm of consolidation was considerably overworked in the first instance. Serious depreciations in values followed. Out of the 100 greatest of the industrial trusts, there was a general decline and slumping in values during the stock panic year of 1903 of something like 43 per cent on the average.

Now, the evils of this new principle in both State and interstate commerce are very numerous, but the most serious and the ones deserving of our most immediate attention are, first, overcapitalization; second, the tendency to monopoly, and, third, the destruction of individual enterprise and success.

By overcapitalization, of course, we do not mean simply a large capitalization. I have already said that we have little to fear, no matter how large the capital of a company is, provided there is free competition or opportunity for other bright men and other capitalists to develop successfully along the same line of industry. But by overcapitalization we mean fictitious capitalization, the issuance of large blocks of stock beyond the value or the cost of the plants consolidated. It is this tendency to make large fortunes by the stroke of a pen, simply in the act and method of consolidation, that is a great temptation and a crying evil. This is the Wall street method of doubling your money over night without putting in any.

I think there has never been a more effective method devised of getting rich quick, of amassing a large fortune without labor, than the organization of a trust. Out in the West we are still pursuing the simple life.

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. DWIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman if they have ever indulged in overcapitalization in the Black Hills country in South Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, yes; there have been fictitious capitalizations in mining operations everywhere, but generally by eastern men. [Laughter.] Corporations of that character have never deceived the prospector or the miner. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that out in the West we are still pursuing the simple life, and while the wealth of the West has increased marvelously in the last decade, our wealth still consists of houses and lands and visible personal property, and not vain commercial imaginations. [Laughter.] We refuse to become excited over financial panics in Wall street. Wall street is the only financial center in America that has no balances anywhere to draw upon. We commend the stand taken by Secretary Shaw in refusing to shape the financial policies of the Treasury Department to accommodate the necessities of stock speculators.

But in the trust process what happens? After creating a large fictitious capitalization in the process of consolidation the promoters proceed to cash in their holdings as far as possible by entering the market, attracting the attention of investors, small and large, to the advantages of this consolidated stock, and generally names of men prominent in the great financial circles are connected with the flotation of this class of securities. The Standard Oil magnates were the promoters of Amalgamated Copper. The Amalgamated Copper enterprise was located, so far as its values were concerned, in the State of Montana, but really the Napoleons of finance who made Amalgamated Copper possible had their business in Wall street, in the city of New York. With such names prominent in the financial world connected with this enterprise, the investing public fairly crowded over one another to acquire the shares. A change came, and the pathway of this great corporation was fairly strewn with the wrecked fortunes of unsuccessful investors.

The United States Steel Corporation, as legitimate an industry as you can find in any overcapitalization, has depreciated in value of stock about 50 per cent since its organization. The reputation of so great a man in financial circles as Pierpont Morgan was severely shattered by his efforts to promote the stupendous shipping trust, which fell to pieces of its own weight as soon as it was set afloat.

Now, having issued a large amount of fictitious stock in the process of consolidation, the next step of course is, if possible, to so increase the profits of the reorganized company that it can pay dividends not only upon the actual capital, but upon the fictitious capital. There are only two ways known to industry of increasing dividends under these circumstances. One is to advance the prices upon the commodity which the people must pay, and the other is to reduce the cost of production, and often this is accomplished by a reduction of the wages of the workmen. Overcapitalization therefore becomes an enemy not only of the honest investor attracted to the stock, but it becomes also an enemy of the honest laborer engaged in the manufacture of that product, as well as an enemy of the consuming public called upon to pay the increased price. Statistics of this sort of consolidation will show that the increased advantages coming from such consolidation are not such as to compensate for the disadvantages of the system.

Now, the next evil and tendency in this system is a tendency to monopoly by these consolidations. The chief purpose of effecting a consolidation of competing companies in any line of industry is to remove competition, and if it is successful in whole or in part, some measure of monopoly is enjoyed as a result of the consolidation.

I think as a people our time-honored and time-tested ideas upon this common subject of monopoly are undergoing a severe strain at the present time. It has been found much more easy to make large profits in any line of industry if you can enjoy some measure of monopoly in the manipulation of that industry. It is so much more satisfactory to be able to fix your own prices on your own commodities without fear of molestation from some enterprising competitor.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will ask the gentleman if, in the various consolidations to which he has referred, he will name one where the effect has not absolutely been to cheapen the cost of production and distribution to the consumer. I want some specific answer, naming some combination where the effect has not been to cheapen the cost of production.

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, there are plenty of them.

Mr. SIBLEY. I trust the gentleman will not be general about it.

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly. I will mention the American Tobacco Company, the American Sugar Refining Company, and the harvester trust. I will name those three that come to me now.

Mr. SIBLEY. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that in, say, the case of the sugar company there is a scale which shows from year to year the decrease in the price to the consumer? Surely the gentleman is familiar with that.

Mr. MARTIN. I am familiar with the history of that subject, and the gentleman will find, if he consults the reports of the Industrial Commission, that the price of sugar advanced materially as a result of the various consolidations that were effected in that industry. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will suggest that the American Tobacco Company has not decreased the cost of the production of tobacco. It has decreased the cost of the things that it makes by monopolizing and making its own price and making everybody pay that price or do without.

Mr. MARTIN. I am speaking solely of the prices to the consumer. I do not think that the advantages coming from the larger operations of manufacture by reason of consolidation is the controlling inducement to the organization of a trust; but undoubtedly this organization, by reason of fewer employees and the consolidation of enterprises, may result in a slight depreciation in the actual cost of production. What I say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], is simply this: That in many instances, in most instances, the result of consolidation does not materially or permanently reduce the cost to the consumer.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I have not had the pleasure of hearing all that the gentleman from South Dakota has said, but he speaks of consolidation since 1899 which has been going on. Now, has that consolidation increased the freight rates from what they were prior to 1899?

Mr. MARTIN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who sits at my left here, is better posted upon that subject than I am; but the statement he now makes to me corroborates my understanding of that subject entirely, and he tells me that the result has been, or at least the fact has been, that the cost of freights has increased in the neighborhood of 5 per cent during that period.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Admitted so by the railroads.

Mr. MARTIN. And that it was admitted to be so by the railroads at the hearings.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is it not true that labor has increased from 15 to 20 per cent, and that the cost of material entering into the economy and operation of railways has increased upward of 30 per cent?

Mr. MARTIN. I will not be able to answer precisely as to the figures the gentleman gives. There has been an appreciation in the wages of labor in the last five years. There has been a general appreciation, indeed, incident to the coming of good times. Good times are always times of high prices. Hard times are always, and logically so, periods of low prices, and these circumstances must be considered in endeavoring to arrive at the cause of conditions under which we are living at the present time.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman if it is not true that even in the case of railroads the increase in the price of labor has not been commensurate with the increase in the cost of living during the period mentioned by him?

Mr. MARTIN. That suggests a subject that I do not like to embark upon at the present time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit me a remark at this time?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The most exhausting and far-reaching investigation that has been made upon that topic shows that the gentleman's proposition is entirely erroneous, and that wages have advanced out of proportion to the advance in the cost of living.

Mr. MARTIN. That is an interesting subject and one that comes very close to the people, and I would commend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the report of the Bureau under the Secretary of Commerce and Labor on that subject.

Mr. STANLEY. I hope that is not Mr. Garfield's report.

Mr. MARTIN. No; that is not Mr. Garfield's report. It comes, I think, from Mr. Austin, or some one else in that Department.

Mr. STANLEY. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask another question? In speaking of the fact that the trusts have increased both the cost of the finished product and lowered the cost of the raw material, I would suggest that the best example of that is the very trust which the gentleman discussed so intelligently at the last session of Congress—the beef trust.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; it is a subject with which I am somewhat familiar. We do not need to go very far into statistics to satisfy our minds what are the facts along this line. Here is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], able along all lines of industrial development, and if he and I were to organize a trust to-day it would be for no philanthropic purpose, but for further profit to ourselves. That is the purpose of such organization, and history and statistics will show it is the result of such organization, and my position upon that subject is this: Herein is coming a peril to the consumer, a peril to the wage-earner, a peril to the small investor that we, as representatives of the people, are called upon to consider and to control and obviate as far as legislation can correct these conditions.

Mr. ALEXANDER rose.

Mr. MARTIN. After the question of the gentleman from New York, as my time is passing and so much has been taken up by this discussion, I will ask that no further questions be allowed until I have some further time given.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman. I am going to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if he has made a tabulation of railroad rates prior, say, to 1899, and the rates that now obtain showing on what roads there have been increases in the last seven years?

Mr. MARTIN. I have not such a tabulation, but I understand in a general way the facts to be about like this: For many years prior to 1898 or 1899 there was general decline in the railroad freight rates, gradual, but quite general. In the beginning of the year 1898 or 1899 there was a gradual though not large advance in freight rates. Now, I am not considering the proposition of railroad rates at present, and my bill does not consider them. I am discussing, Mr. Chairman, a topic germane to this bill, but I am quite willing to believe, so far as the advance in freight rates is concerned, that the advance since 1898 is incident to the general advance of prices under prosperity—which has a tendency to advance all prices—under which we have been passing during the last seven or eight years.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You speak for your section, the great State of South Dakota. That is true, is it?

Mr. MARTIN. I beg your pardon.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That statement you made is true of the great section of the country which you represent, South Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN. I have not examined it as applied to my own State very recently, but I understand that to be the general result throughout the United States. Now, I will ask not to be interrupted for a short time until I see what time I have left for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. MARTIN. Now, I am informed that the consolidated corporation holding the electric light and gas franchises for the city of New York is capitalized for $75,000,000. I am informed that in that consolidation $50,000,000 represents the value of the numerous franchises held by that corporation and something like $25,000,000 the cost of the construction of those various plants, and I am informed further, and it is a good illustration of the proposition that I am endeavoring to present, that annually that corporation pays a respectable dividend upon the entire $75,000,000 of capitalization.

It is true that a great corporation might enjoy some measure of monopolistic power without having within its organization this principle of a trust or consolidation, but that is very unusual. Monopoly, indeed, in this day of clashing intelligence and competition can scarcely be created by any other means than sudden consolidation of competitors. The superiority of one man or set of men, intellectually or financially, over a hundred or a thousand other men is not sufficiently great as to give them a controlling advantage over their fellows provided we can maintain a fair field and no favor, and that administration of our national affairs and our State affairs comes nearest to being an ideal administration that maintains a square deal in all lines of industry and gives to the large corporation and the small corporation and to the individual equal advantages in the race for prosperity and success.

Even a greater peril from this movement is the discouragement of individual enterprise and success. The American people are to-day great among the peoples of this earth not because of the colossal intellect of a few men or the great accomplishments of a few men, but the American people are great in the history of the world because of the superior intelligence and character of the average American citizen. [Applause.] And whatever discourages the individual initiative to that extent is against the best advancement of our people intellectually, socially, and morally.

A great trust has already an extended monopoly in a particular line. It desires greater monopolistic power in that line of business. Its plan is, therefore, to crush out, annihilate, the small competitor. How does it accomplish it? It accomplishes it by reducing the price of that particular commodity in the particular locality where the small competitor is seeking to maintain his life, away below the actual cost of production, and it supplies itself with the munitions for this unholy warfare by advancing the prices of the same commodity in other portions of the country where its operations are not disputed.

I am here to say that no amount of individual initiative, no amount of individual acumen and courage, can live in the face of that sort of predatory, destructive competition. Personally I am against this whole modern fad and idea of trusts, so far as it embodies this monopolistic principle. Private monopoly, whether in the hands of a few or in the hands of many, is against the best interests of the individual. It is against the best interests of the country. It is wholly and purely selfish, unpatriotic, and un-American. [Applause.]

When private monopoly has to do with an article of prime necessity as food or fuel, it is simply intolerable. Monarchical governments have not long endured a monopoly of any of the food staples of their people, and certainly a free republic will not.

Now, if I am at all correct in my diagnosis of the industrial conditions under which we are laboring, as connected with this particular class of corporations, what is the remedy? What are the conditions? There are forty-five States in the Union. Every corporation engaged in commerce obtains its charter from some one of these States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for fifteen minutes more in consideration of the interruptions I have had.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes of additional time.

Mr. MARTIN. All corporations owe their existence to the charter of some one of the States. But in this day of quick transportation and instantaneous communication no great corporation is engaged simply in business in one State. They enter into all of the States in interstate commerce. It is apparent, therefore, that a remedy that will contain within it any hope of a successful solution of these questions must be national in its character, because the problem is national. The various States have struggled with the problem as best they can; at least, some of them have done so. Up to date fifteen of the States have absolutely no legislation against trusts and monopolies. Among them is New Jersey, and other States where charters are most commonly taken by these large concerns. In thirty of the States there are antimonopoly laws, laws against trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. Public sentiment upon this subject has been developing rapidly in recent years.

The legislatures of last winter, 1905, of seven States passed stringent laws along this line. And I want to say that in my opinion the State of Missouri, of all of these States, pivotal as it was, the battle ground as it was in the great controversy between the North and the South at the time of the civil war, has shown as much courage and as much determination as any one of the States in its effort to eradicate this evil. But I say the problem is national, and the remedy therefor must be national.

Now, in my opinion any remedy that will be successful, any legislation that will be successful, must combine two or three principles at least. First, publicity; secondly, free competition; thirdly, close Federal supervision or regulation. We have sought to give publicity to these corporations to some extent by the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor and the Bureau of Corporations. But the powers of the Bureau along that line are quite limited. They apply rather to special investigations. The purpose of my bill upon that particular branch of this subject—publicity—is to throw the initiative upon the corporation, say to the corporation, "You can not engage in interstate commerce unless you show that you are a corporation for lawful purposes and have been lawfully organized."

The Sherman antitrust law is a strong law. It is only a question of its enforcement. The bill we are considering would throw the burden of proof of good character upon the corporation instead of leaving to the Government, through its detective agencies and courts, the difficult task of prosecuting violators of the law by civil or criminal procedure, as they are endeavoring to do to-day in the celebrated beef-trust cases.

Publicity is not simply a theory; it is a remedy, actual, practical, and important; and if applied in time it will certainly be a check upon overcapitalization. The evil deed is done in the dark. Men will not buy watered stocks if they know they are watered. If books may at any time be disclosed to the inspection of an examiner from the Department of Commerce and Labor, books will be honestly kept. How long do you suppose the president of the New York Life or the Mutual Life Insurance company would have been drawing a salary of $150,000 a year if the stockholders of those companies had known he was drawing a salary of that fabulous amount?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will allow me a question right along the line that he has taken, I want to give him an opportunity to state if he does not think it a fact that the formation of a trust by the consolidation of several companies, instead of giving the consumer the benefit of the saving to be made by the consolidation—their claim being that the object of the capitalization is that a saving may be made by the consolidation—they force the payment of dividends on the water thus injected, and thereby deprive the consumer of the saving secured in the formation of this corporation and prevents the giving of lower price to the consumer.

Mr. MARTIN. These consolidations are not effected for the purpose of benefiting the consumer, but the companies consolidated.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will permit me, you have argued very ably that there ought to be some way by which the character should be shown of these corporations. Do you not think it would be a wise policy to provide, say, in this bill by amendment, that all persons dealing in interstate commerce should be required to make oath, and file the same before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that they are not engaged in the sale of any trust or monopolized article, and in that way could we not prevent the trusts from engaging in interstate commerce?

Mr. MARTIN. That might be a wise provision, but I do not think there would be so much obtained from that as the gentleman seems to think.

I was saying publicity is an antidote for overcapitalization. After publicity (and my bill in terms provides for that in all of its parts) competition is an important factor. I think we have but little to fear from monopolies, provided we can maintain a competitive field, because with the great wealth now massed in this country there is money to be invested in all lines of profitable industry. Competition is not only the life of trade, but competition is the death of monopoly; and our Government is rendering to its people a service of high order when it takes the initiative in legislation that will insure a free and open market to the farmers and manufacturers of this country wherever it can be found.

The next necessity, I think, in any legislation seeking to furnish relief against abuses in interstate commerce is close regulation by the Federal Government. The great corporations ought not to resist reasonable regulation and control by either the State or Federal Government. They exist by favor of the law. Their franchises are immensely valuable; their properties and accumulations are immensely valuable. They are protected by the laws of the State and of the Federal Government. They ought to make no complaint against investigation, control, or regulation of their operations in so far that they may be kept within the reasonable bounds of law.

Great power is attended with great dangers. Shall we therefore decline to use great power? The use of the locomotive engine is attended with tremendous danger to life and property. Shall we therefore cease to use it, or shall we use it with courage, with care, and with perfect control? Fortunately, these great aggregations of capital owe, as I have said, their very existence to the operation of law. They are the creations of law, and they can be controlled by law. If the public good should demand it, we could legislate that no corporation should be organized with a capital beyond a certain amount. We can certainly, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, provide that corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate commerce only by complying with certain conditions. Indeed, we could legislate every corporation engaged in interstate commerce out of business entirely and have the authority of the Constitution for such action, provided the public good should demand it, which it does not.

Now, these problems will be solved. I think they are more than half solved already. In this period of quick understanding of public questions, public sentiment, public information, and public judgment will mature rapidly. The American people are to-day complete masters of the situation in the exercise of the powers of the Constitution and under the law.

These problems will be solved without destroying any important industry, because by the dissolution of a trust you destroy nothing of value, even in instances where they must be dissolved. You simply destroy the unlawful combination, leaving the properties and franchises just as they existed before the unlawful consolidation. These great aggregations of capital and labor, with their monopolistic tendencies and powers eliminated, with their objectionable features laid aside, will, I believe, under proper national regulation and control, continue to be a part of that mighty industrial machinery at home and abroad by means of which the United States will continue to maintain throughout all time her proud position as the chief commercial nation of the world. [Applause.]

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ON REGULATION OF INTERSTATE CORPORATIONS.

There is a widespread conviction in the minds of the American people that the great corporations known as trusts are in certain of their features and tendencies hurtful to the general welfare. This springs from no spirit of envy or uncharitableness, nor lack of pride in the great industrial achievements that have placed this country at the head of the nations struggling for commercial supremacy.

* * * * * * *

The first essential in determining how to deal with the great industrial combinations is knowledge of the facts—publicity. In the interest of the public the Government should have the right to inspect and examine the workings of the great corporations engaged in interstate business. Publicity is the only sure remedy which we can now invoke. What further remedies are needed in the way of governmental regulation or taxation can only be determined after publicity has been obtained by process of law and in the course of administration. The first requisite is knowledge, full and complete—knowledge which may be made public to the world.

Artificial bodies, such as corporations and joint stock or other associations depending upon any statutory law for their existence or privileges, should be subject to proper governmental supervision, and full and accurate information as to their operations should be made public regularly at reasonable intervals.

* * * * * * *

The large corporations, commonly called "trusts," though organized in one State, always do business in many States, often doing very little business in the State where they are incorporated. There is utter lack of uniformity in the State laws about them; and as no State has any exclusive interest in or power over their acts, it has in practice proved impossible to get adequate regulation through State action. Therefore, in the interest of the whole people, the nation should, without interfering with the power of the States in the matter itself, also assume power of supervision and regulation over all corporations doing an interstate business. This is especially true where the corporation derives a portion of its wealth from the existence of some monopolistic element or tendency in its business. There would be no hardship in such supervision; banks are subject to it, and in their case it is now accepted as a simple matter of course. Indeed, it is probable that supervision of corporations by the National Government need not go so far as is now the case with the supervision exercised over them by so conservative a State as Massachusetts in order to produce excellent results. (Message to first session Fifty-seventh Congress, December 3, 1901.)

Corporations, and especially combinations of corporations, should be managed under public regulation. Experience has shown that under our system of government the necessary supervision can not be obtained by State action. It must, therefore, be achieved by national action.

No more important subject can come before the Congress than this of the regulation of interstate business. This country can not afford to sit supine on the plea that under our peculiar system of government we are helpless in the presence of the new conditions, and unable to grapple with them or to cut out whatever of evil has arisen in connection with them. The power of the Congress to regulate interstate commerce is an absolute and unqualified grant, and without limitations other than those prescribed by the Constitution. The Congress has constitutional authority to make all laws necessary and proper for executing this power, and I am satisfied that this power has not been exhausted by any legislation now on the statute books. It is evident, therefore, that evils restrictive of commercial freedom and entailing restraint upon national commerce fall within the regulative power of the Congress, and that a wise and reasonable law would be a necessary and proper exercise of Congressional authority to the end that such evils should be eradicated.

I believe that monopolies, unjust discriminations, which prevent or cripple competition, fraudulent overcapitalization, and other evils in trust organizations and practices which injuriously affect interstate trade can be prevented under the power of the Congress to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" through regulations and requirements operating directly upon such commerce, the instrumentalities thereof, and those engaged therein. (Message to second session Fifty-seventh Congress, December 2, 1902.)

With a nation as with a man the most important things are those of the household, and therefore the country is especially to be congratulated on what has been accomplished in the direction of providing for the exercise of supervision over the great corporations and combinations of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The Congress has created the Department of Commerce and Labor, including the Bureau of Corporations, with for the first time authority to secure proper publicity of such proceedings of these great corporations as the public has the right to know. It has provided for the expediting of suits for the enforcement of the Federal antitrust law; and by another law it has secured equal treatment to all producers in the transportation of their goods, thus taking a long stride forward in making effective the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

* * * * * * *

In enacting the laws above enumerated the Congress proceeded on sane and conservative lines. Nothing revolutionary was attempted; but a common-sense and successful effort was made in the direction of seeing that corporations are so handled as to subserve the public good. The legislation was moderate. It was characterized throughout by the idea that we were not attacking corporations, but endeavoring to provide for doing away with any evil in them; that we drew the line against misconduct, not against wealth; gladly recognizing the great good done by the capitalist who alone, or in conjunction with his fellows, does his work along proper and legitimate lines. The purpose of the legislation, which purpose will undoubtedly be fulfilled, was to favor such a man when he does well, and to supervise his action only to prevent him from doing ill. Publicity can do no harm to the honest corporation. The only corporation that has cause to dread it is the corporation which shrinks from the light, and about the welfare of such corporations we need not be oversensitive. The work of the Department of Commerce and Labor has been conditioned upon this theory, of securing fair treatment alike for labor and for capital. (Message to second session Fifty-eighth Congress, December 7, 1903.)

When we come to deal with great corporations the need for the Government to act directly is far greater than in the case of labor, because great corporations can become such only by engaging in interstate commerce, and interstate commerce is peculiarly the field of the General Government. It is an absurdity to expect to eliminate the abuses in great corporations by State action. It is difficult to be patient with an argument that such matters should be left to the States, because more than one State pursues the policy of creating on easy terms corporations which are never operated within that State at all, but in other States whose laws they ignore. The National Government alone can deal adequately with these great corporations. To try to deal with them in an intemperate, destructive, or demagogic spirit would, in all probability, mean that nothing whatever would be accomplished, and, with absolute certainty, that if anything were accomplished it would be of a harmful nature. The American people need to continue to show the very qualities that they have shown—that is, moderation, good sense, the earnest desire to avoid doing any damage, and yet the quiet determination to proceed, step by step, without halt and without hurry, in eliminating or at least in minimizing whatever of mischief or of evil there is to interstate commerce in the conduct of great corporations. They are acting in no spirit of hostility to wealth, either individual or corporate. They are not against the rich man any more than against the poor man. On the contrary, they are friendly alike toward rich man and toward poor man, provided only that each acts in a spirit of justice and decency toward his fellows. Great corporations are necessary, and only men of great and singular mental power can manage such corporations successfully, and such men must have great rewards. But these corporations should be managed with due regard to the interest of the public as a whole. Where this can be done under the present laws it must be done. Where these laws come short others should be enacted to supplement them. (Message to 3d sess. 58th Cong., December 6, 1904.)

UNWISE ANTIMONOPOLY LAWS.

So much for one feature of our foreign policy. Now for one feature of our domestic policiy. One of the main features of our national governmental policy should be the effort to secure adequate and effective supervisory and regulatory control over all great corporations doing an interstate business. Much of the legislation aimed to prevent the evils connected with the enormous development of these great corporations has been ineffective, partly because it aimed at doing too much and partly because it did not confer on the Government a really efficient method of holding any guilty corporation to account. The effort to prevent all restraint of competition, whether harmful or beneficial, has been ill judged; what is needed is not so much the effort to prevent combination as a vigilant and effective control of the combinations formed, so as to secure just and equitable dealing on their part alike toward the public generally, toward their smaller competitors, and toward the wageworkers in their employ.

Under the present laws we have in the last four years accomplished much that is of substantial value, but the difficulties in the way have been so great as to prove that further legislation is advisable. Many corporations show themselves honorably desirous to obey the law, but, unfortunately, some corporations, and very wealthy ones at that, exhaust every effort which can be suggested by the highest ability, or secured by the most lavish expenditure of money, to defeat the purposes of the laws on the statute books.

DRASTIC LAW, MAYBE, FOR PACKERS.

The Government has very properly exercised moderation in attempting to enforce the criminal provisions of the statute, but it has become our conviction that in some cases, such as that of at least certain of the beef packers recently indicted in Chicago, it is impossible longer to show leniency. Moreover, if the existing law proves to be inadequate, so that under established rules of evidence clear violations may not be readily proved, defiance of the law must inevitably lead to further legislation. This legislation may be more drastic than I would prefer. If so, it must be distinctly understood that it will be because of the stubborn determination of some of the great combinations in striving to prevent the enforcement of the law as it stands by every device, legal and illegal. Very many of these men seem to think that the alternative is simply between submitting to the mild kind of governmental control we advocate and the absolute freedom to do whatever they think best. They are greatly in error. Either they will have to submit to reasonable supervision and regulation by the national authorities or else they will ultimately have to submit to governmental action of a far more drastic type. Personally, I think our people would be most unwise if they let any exasperation due to the acts of certain great corporations drive them into drastic action, and I should oppose such action. But the great corporations are themselves to blame if by their opposition to what is legal and just they foster the popular feeling which tells for such drastic action.

Some great corporations resort to every technical expedient to render enforcement of the law impossible, and their obstructive tactics and refusal to acquiesce in the policy of the law have taxed to the utmost the machinery of the Department of Justice. In my judgment Congress may well inquire whether it should not seek other means for carrying into effect the law.

SHOULD REGULATE ALL TRUSTS.

I believe that all corporations engaged in interstate commerce should be under the supervision of the National Government. I do not believe in taking steps hastily or rashly, and it may be that all that is necessary in the immediate future is to pass an interstate-commerce bill conferring upon some branch of the Executive Government the power of effective action to remedy the abuses in connection with railway transportation. But in the end, and in my judgment at a time not very far off, we shall have to, or at least we shall find that we ought to, take further action as regards all corporations doing interstate business. The enormous increase in interstate trade, resulting from the industrial development of the last quarter of a century, makes it proper that the Federal Government should, so far as may be necessary to carry into effect its national policy, assume a degree of administrative control of these great corporations.

It may well be that we shall find that the only effective way of exercising this supervision is to require all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to produce proof satisfactory, say, to the Department of Commerce, that they are not parties to any contract or combination or engaged in any monopoly in interstate trade in violation of the anti-trust law, and that their conduct on certain other specified points is proper; and, moreover, that these corporations shall agree, with a penalty of forfeiture of their right to engage in such commerce, to furnish any evidence of any kind as to their trade between the States whenever so required by the Department of Commerce.

It is the almost universal policy of the several States, provided by statute, that foreign corporations may lawfully conduct business within their boundaries, only when they produce certificates that they have complied with the requirements of their respective States; in other words, that corporations shall not enjoy the privileges and immunities afforded by the State governments without first complying with the policy of their laws. Now the benefits which corporations engaged in interstate trade enjoy under the United States Government are incalculable; and in respect of such trade the jurisdiction of the Federal Government is supreme when it chooses to exercise it. (Chautauqua address, August 11, 1905.)

So long as the finances of the nation are kept upon an honest basis no other question of internal economy with which the Congress has the power to deal begins to approach in importance the matter of endeavoring to secure proper industrial conditions under which the individuals, and especially the great corporations, doing an interstate business are to act. The makers of our National Constitution provided especially that the regulation of interstate commerce should come within the sphere of the General Government. The arguments in favor of their taking this stand were even then overwhelming. But they are far stronger to-day, in view of the enormous development of great business agencies, usually corporate in form. Experience has shown conclusively that it is useless to try to get any adequate regulation and supervision of these great corporations by State action. Such regulation and supervision can only be effectively exercised by a sovereign whose jurisdiction is coextensive with the field of work of the corporations—that is by the National Government. I believe that this regulation and supervision can be obtained by the enactment of law by the Congress.

It has been a misfortune that the national laws on this subject have hitherto been of a negative or prohibitive rather than an affirmative kind, and still more that they have in part sought to prohibit what could not be effectively prohibited, and have in part in their prohibitions confounded what should be allowed and what should not be allowed. It is generally useless to try to prohibit all restraint on competition, whether this restraint be reasonable or unreasonable; and where it is not useless it is generally hurtful. Events have shown that it is not possible adequately to secure the enforcement of any law of this kind by incessant appeal to the courts. The Department of Justice has for the last four years devoted more attention to the enforcement of the antitrust legislation than to anything else. Much has been accomplished; particularly marked has been the moral effect of the prosecutions; but it is increasingly evident that there will be a very insufficient beneficial result in the way of economic change. The successful prosecution of one device to evade the law immediately develops another device to accomplish the same purpose. What is needed is not sweeping prohibition of every arrangement, good or bad, which may tend to restrict competition, but such adequate supervision and regulation as will prevent any restriction of competition from being to the detriment of the public—as well as such supervision and regulation as will prevent other abuses in no way connected with restriction of competition.

Of these abuses, perhaps the chief, although by no means the only one, is overcapitalization—generally itself the result of dishonest promotion—because of the myriad evils it brings in its train; for such overcapitalization often means an inflation that invites business panic; it always conceals the true relation of the profit earned to the capital actually invested, and it creates a burden of interest payments which is a fertile cause of improper reduction in or limitation of wages; it damages the small investor, discourages thrift, and encourages gambling and speculation, while perhaps worst of all is the trickiness and dishonesty which it implies—for harm to morals is worse than any possible harm to material interests—and the debauchery of politics and business by great dishonest corporations is far worse than any actual material evil they do the public. Until the National Government obtains, in some manner which the wisdom of the Congress may suggest, proper control over the big corporations engaged in interstate commerce—that is, over the great majority of the big corporations—it will be impossible to deal adequately with these evils. (Message to first session Fifty-ninth Congress, December 5, 1905.)

A bill (H. R. 13095) to regulate corporations, joint stock companies, and other associations engaging in interstate and foreign commerce in food and fuel supplies.

Be it enacted, etc., That every corporation, joint stock company, and other association, except corporations doing exclusively the business of common carriers, engaging after January 1, 1907, in interstate or foreign trade or commerce, or trade or commerce between Territories, or between any Territory and the District of Columbia, or between any Territory or the District of Columbia and any State, in cattle, sheep, swine, dressed meats, meat products, poultry, poultry products, dairy products, grain, cereals, breadstuffs, coal, oil, lumber, or other food or fuel supplies, shall first obtain from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor a license or franchise permitting it to engage in such trade or commerce.

SEC. 2. That before such license or franchise shall be issued such corporation, joint stock company, or association shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that the said corporation, company, or association is not overcapitalized, but that its alleged capital represents only a fair valuation of the rights and property actually owned and possessed by it; that it is not an unlawful trust or combination, or operated in violation of the laws of the United States, and that it is not its purpose to conduct a business in violation of the present or future laws of the United States; that it has not entered into any contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or Territories, or with the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, and that it is not its purpose to enter into such contract, combination, or conspiracy; and that it is not monopolizing or attempting to monopolize, or combining or conspiring with any other person, corporation, company, or association to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce herein mentioned, and that it is not its purpose to monopolize, or to combine or conspire to monopolize, any part of such trade or commerce.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is authorized to issue licenses and franchises to corporations, joint stock companies, and other associations to engage in such trade and commerce, upon proper application and satisfactory showing, as herein provided, and such licenses or franchises shall continue in force during the legal life of such corporations, companies, or associations, respectively, unless sooner forfeited or suspended, as hereinafter provided. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor is authorized to establish a schedule of reasonable fees for the examination of such corporations, companies, and associations, and for the issuance of such licenses or franchises, and to charge and collect the same. The amounts collected for such charges shall constitute a fund to be expended for the promotion of the work of the Bureau of Corporations of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

SEC. 4. That between the 1st and 10th days of July in each year, and at such other times as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may require, every corporation, joint stock company, or other association engaging in trade or commerce, as herein provided, shall file a report in the office of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, signed and sworn to by its president, its treasurer, its general manager, and a majority of its directors, or by the persons exercising the powers usually exercised by such officers and directors, setting forth such information concerning its organization, capitalization, properties, earnings, profits, dividends, and business methods as may be required by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. A failure on the part of the said corporation, company, or other association to make and file the annual report within the time herein provided, or to make and file any additional report within thirty days after written demand therefor by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall cause a suspension of the franchise or license of such corporation, company, or association, and all the rights thereunder, until the requirements of this section are fully complied with.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of Corporations, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall, as often as shall be deemed necessary or proper, appoint a suitable person or persons to make an examination of the affairs of every corporation, joint stock company, or other association herein referred to, who shall have power to make a thorough examination into the books, records, and all the affairs of such corporation, company, or association, and in doing so to examine any of the officers and agents thereof on oath; and shall make a full and detailed report of the condition of such corporation, company, or association to the Commissioner of Corporations. All persons appointed to be examiners of corporations, joint stock companies, or other associations shall receive the same compensation for such examinations as is now, or may hereafter be, allowed by law to examiners of national banks, which amounts shall be assessed by the Commissioner of Corporations upon and paid by the respective corporation, company, or association so examined.

SEC. 6. That if any corporation, joint stock company, or other association having obtained from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor a license or franchise to engage in interstate or foreign commerce or other commerce within the territorial boundaries of the United States as herein provided, shall thereafter violate any of the provisions of the statutes of the United States against unlawful restraints and monopolies in the trade and commerce of the United States, or the provisions of acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, such offense shall work a forfeiture of the license or franchise of the said corporation, company, or other association and of all its right to engage in the trade or commerce aforesaid. It shall thereupon become the duty of the Attorney-General to maintain an action in the proper circuit court of the United States to forfeit such license or franchise and to oust such corporation, company, or association of all rights and privileges thereunder, and the several circuit courts of the United States are hereby given original jurisdiction of such actions and of all proceedings thereunder. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, upon a new application and further showing on behalf of such corporation, company, or association, may in his discretion, if satisfied that the unlawful features of such corporation, company, or association have been eliminated and that other violations of the laws against unlawful restraints or monopolies are not likely to be made by such corporation, company, or association, grant a second license or franchise to such corporation, company, or association. But if such corporation, company, or association shall be finally adjudged guilty of a further or second offense no other license or franchise shall be issued to it, and it shall be forever barred and prohibited from engaging in the trade and commerce aforesaid.

SEC. 7. That is shall be unlawful for any corporation, joint stock company, or other association to engage in the trade or commerce in food or fuel supplies herein referred to without the license or franchise herein provided or during its suspension. Any corporation, joint stock company, or other association, and any director, officer, or agent in its behalf which shall, after January 1, 1907, engage in such trade or commerce in violation of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall for each offense, in addition to such penalty for contempt as the court in case of disobedience to its lawful order may impose, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. That the several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petitions setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

SEC. 9. That any cattle, sheep, swine, dressed meats, meat products, poultry, poultry products, grain, cereals, breadstuffs, coal, oil, lumber, or other food or fuel supplies owned by or under the control of any corporation, joint stock company, or other association engaging in the trade or commerce herein referred to and without the license or franchise herein provided or during its suspension, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to or from a foreign country, a Territory, or the District of Columbia, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that it is understood between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and myself, as there are three or four gentlemen who wish to oppose the bill, that we shall yield to them jointly.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is painful not to share the sweet and child-like confidence that has been expressed by so many gentlemen that with the passage of this bill the era of railroad millennium will come. It is disagreeable in a chorus of universal harmony to strike the one solitary discordant note. I do not rise here to say that I think there are no railroad evils. I rise to express my fear that, as often happens in attempting to work cures of business conditions by governmental regulations, we shall go out of the frying pan only to find ourselves in the fire.

Mr. Chairman, although the fear was expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts a year or two ago, I do not believe that this legislation is going to do any serious harm to railroad interests. I am not lying awake nights from any fear that the value of railroad stocks or railroad bonds will be materially diminished by its passage. If that were the case, certainly it would be most serious, because the railroad property of this land belongs not to a half dozen men, but it is safe to say that there are (I think I am below the mark in saying it) 1,000,000 persons, and I dare say many more, representing 5,000,000 people whom they support, who are interested in the railroad corporations of the United States. Therefore if any legislation that we pass should prove largely injurious or partially injurious to those great interests held by a great proportion of our population that would be most serious. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not fear that. We are a very practical people. We pass a good many bad laws, but when they do not work well in execution we cease to attempt to execute them. The number of laws passed in response to a supposed popular demand which now sleep the legislative sleep, where alike just and unjust laws are found, is certainly exceedingly large. But any apprehension I have as to the possible evil results of this legislation are not as to the results to the railroads, but to the men who use the railroads. Now, we must consider this question from a broad standpoint. No one, of course, would stand up and say that in the railroad system of this country there are not mistakes, acts of injustice, acts of unfairness; but it must be considered, as any great question is considered, from a broad standpoint; we must consider whether by this measure of governmental regulation we shall, in endeavoring to cure those ills, create the possibility of greater ills.

Now, this much must be said, that the railroad system of this country, whatever its faults, is a better system, judged by its results, than any other. No other one industrial force has had so much to do with the rapidity with which this country has been built up as our railroad system. The district represented by my friend from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], who made so admirable a speech a moment ago, would this day, if it had not been for our railroad system, be governed by some Pawnee chief. Instead of politicians quarreling, Sioux Indians would be scalping each other [laughter] had it not been for the rapidity with which the railroads of this country have pushed out there. That does not show that there are no faults in the system, but it does show that its general results have been very extraordinary.

Now, it is proposed, in order to meet certain evils—we concede that they are evils—to have a system of Government supervision; and surely, Mr. Chairman, the greatest power that can be exercised over any business—the greatest power that can be exercised over the railroad system—is the power to regulate rates. The essence, the foundation, the lifeblood of every business depends upon how much money it gets for the work it does or the goods it has to sell. Let us first consider, in their general results, the differences between different systems of management. Government management—Government ownership of railroads—is not a new thing. A considerable proportion of the railroads in Europe, for example, are owned by the government. Over all the railroads of Europe, not excepting England, the government has exercised a larger degree of control than it ever has in the United States. More than in any other land, the railroad system of the United States has grown up by its own action and with less Government supervision than has been exercised in any other country. So, in a general way, it is fair to consider what have been the results of a system subject to government interference, as in Europe, and the system, up to this time certainly with very little Government interference, in this country. Has the Government, in its wisdom and by its action, brought better results for those who dealt with the railroads than our railroads, whatever may be their faults, have produced, actuated by and acting with the impulse of intelligent self-interest, in this country?

I do not think I overstate it when I say the average price of freight rates in this country does not very much exceed one-third of the average price of similar freight rates in Europe. It may be fairly said that there are other things to be considered—that we have a vast amount of freight to pull, we have a long haul, we have advantages for the railroad, but, most of all, Mr. Chairman, we have the most intelligent system of development of railroads and the best and cheapest methods by which freight can be hauled. At all events, the result is that the man who lives in the United States, however much he may have suffered, however great may be the need of the passage of this bill, has his freight carried for him at one-half or one-third of the amount paid by the man who is so fortunate or unfortunate as to live where the railroads are wholly or largely controlled by government action.

So, as an object lesson, it would seem that in some governments the inherent evil that belongs to government control, to government supervision, have worked more harm than the evils undoubtedly found in individual enterprise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word further. Railroads make mistakes. They not only make mistakes, but try to get unfair advantages often. But this thing is sure—the railroad enterprises, like all the great business enterprises in this country, have become the greatest in the world, because they have had the most intelligent and enterprising men to manage them. No railroad can succeed, no railroad ever has succeeded, or ever will succeed, except by building up the interests of the people with whom it is to deal. There is no railroad paying dividends whose only patrons are bankrupts. There is no railroad gaining wealth by bringing goods from any people in a country, or any portion of the land, that does not make it possible for the people in that portion of the land to send their goods by freight at a livable rate. If it does not do that, as I say, instead of great interests growing up along its line it has no cities along its line; instead of a country filling in as the western country has filled in, it would run to region of barren acres and alkali plains. So the railroads have necessarily to govern their action by the motive of an intelligent self-interest.

The question is whether for the people at large an intelligent self-interest brings them the best results or the control of Government officials brings the best results. As I said, I wish I could share the confidence which seems to be almost infantile in the certainty of advantageous results being worked out by the provisions of this bill with reference to rates, for otherwise I have nothing to say about it. There is not, there can not be a more complicated question than the fixing of railroad rates in a great country like this. There are hundreds of thousands, there are millions of different rates from every city and town to every other city and town. The fixing of those has to be regulated by a multiplicity of considerations—the rate that the goods will bear, the rate that can be paid and the shipper live and prosper, the rate charged by a competing road, the possible rates furnished by water communication. All those problems of infinite delicacy, of infinite difficulty, are settled by thousands and tens of thousands of men in this land who give to it their lives, who have the benefit of the knowledge of the situation by lifelong service. It is said that grave errors result, great evils result. Well, we are asked to believe that seven respectable gentlemen who have many other things to do besides, will have the capacity to pass upon this infinitely difficult question with greater wisdom than those to whom it is intrusted. It is inferred by everyone that the gentlemen who are selected by the President of the United States and placed in these responsible positions will be gifted with what they will certainly need, infinite wisdom, infinite equity, to reach these results. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think one may be allowed to doubt. If this bill is actually to be enforced to any large extent, with millions of rates, with a vast number of people who are willing to get their freight rates for less than they pay, because few are the men who are not willing to get anything at less than they pay, instead of having a court of seven judges, you ought to have a court of 7,000 judges to pass upon these questions.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not want to break into the argument of the gentleman, but the gentleman's whole argument is directed against a commission having a general rate-making power. Now, as he understands, I suppose, this bill is not giving the Commission the power to fix all rates, millions and millions, as he says, for which there ought to be 7,000 judges to fix them, but it is only to give the Commission power to fix a reasonable rate, etc., according to the language of the bill, where an unreasonable rate is found to obtain and complaint is made. I would like to hear the gentleman on the subject, about giving them permission to fix that one rate where the rate has been unreasonable.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman had done me the kindness to listen with some clearness to what I said——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I was listening.

Mr. PERKINS. Then my expression was doubtless obscure. I said there existed in this country millions of rates. The gentleman does not deny that. I said this law says that where the rate is unjust or unfair from a multiplicity of reasons, a man may make complaint and that may be passed upon by the court. Now, it seems to me that I can say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] one of the two things results. There are millions of rates. Any man can complain of an unfair rate. Every man is ready to complain of an unfair rate. Either the number of unfair rates in this country of which men will complain is infinitesimally small or else there will be a number of complaints, enough to keep these judges and 7,000 more busy. If there are no complaints, if we are passing this bill, demanded by all the people of the land, to meet this great evil, and yet it turns out that out of millions and millions of rates the only ones that are unfair and unjust can be disposed by seven gentlemen in the Interstate Commerce Commission, besides attending to their other business, then certainly we are doing a great deal of talking over a very small evil. If, on the other hand, as has been suggested constantly, all over the land there are unfair practices which must be regulated, then surely complaints will come in of unfair rates, not a half dozen, not a dozen that could be easily disposed of by the seven judges, but by the hundreds and thousands in which they exist. Which is the fact I shall leave the gentleman to decide for himself.

Now, I want to say a word or two more about a further branch of this bill, and I wish to say right here that I do not think, as I have said before, that this bill is going to do any great amount of harm. First, as I said before, when we pass foolish bills, we do not enforce them, and that is well. Further than that I think this bill may answer a useful purpose as has been suggested here.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I be permitted to interrupt the gentleman to ask one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly; I yield to anyone.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says that this bill will not do any harm—of course that it will not do any harm to the railroads.

Mr. PERKINS. I suggested that probably no harm would result to them from it.

Mr. BARTLETT. No possible harm. Then, if that be true, why should the railroads threaten to reduce the wages of their employees if it is passed?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know that they have threatened to do so, and I do not believe they would. If they have threatened I do not think that amounts to anything. I am not here to speak in behalf of the railroads. My only objection to this bill is a strong, deeply rooted aversion to giving Government control—Government management based upon the knowledge we all have of the unsatisfactory result of Government management in any branch in which it is exercised. Now, as I say, it has been stated here, and said with much force, that this bill will answer a useful purpose, because vesting these men with the power to control, to regulate, to overset unjust rates, will deter the railroads, will operate as a thing of fear upon the railroads. There is much force in that suggestion. If we say that this legislation is to be useful as a scarecrow, there is force in that. A scarecrow is——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky rose.

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield in a moment. A scarecrow is by no means to be disregarded among agricultural implements. Still, after all, it is not one of the largest importance. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I interrupt you just for a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Out in the Republican part of my State of Kentucky there is a mountainous region where they get out a great many ties. The Louisville and Nashville Railroad runs through that mountainous region, and these mountain people get out ties and pile them up along that railroad, and the railroad has positively refused, as I am informed, to transport those ties into another State, except at prices that amount to a confiscation of the ties, giving as a reason that they will need those ties in a year or two along their own road. Now, those people have no redress at all. They can not ship those ties except at a price dictated by the railroad company. Ought there to be any remedy for that condition in this country?

Mr. PERKINS. Very possibly. The question which I wish to suggest is this: If this Commission did nothing but frighten railroads, all might be well, but when Government officials are vested with power they sometimes seek to exercise, we are granting to Government supervision a most important function in a most important industry. All will agree in that. Now, Mr. Chairman, have the results of Government operation, the wisdom of Government control, been such that we can, without some degree of hesitation certainly, turn over so great a power as this? Have the management of public utilities in the cities of this land, so far as they are owned by the cities, been satisfactory? Can I, without crime, say we have had under discussion in this House within a few days the Government control over the Panama Canal? Has it been so satisfactory, has it shown such results that we will necessarily acknowledge its superiority to individual management?

Now, coming to one other thing I wish to discuss, and a thing in which it seems to me the greatest possible danger of this bill is to be found, so far as the question of individual rates—of complaints of individual shippers—I am quite inclined to believe that the seven judges will be amply sufficient to the demands that will be made upon them; but the gentleman from Michigan said that he had hoped this bill would deal with differentials, but he thought it did not. It is hard to say for what other purpose the gentleman from Iowa, exceedingly skillful and exceedingly apt in the drafting of legislation, in which no man of this House is his superior and no man has had greater experience, inserted what we find in section 15, page 10, where it appears—

That where any regulations or practices whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting such rates are unjust—

That is one thing—

or unreasonable—

And that is another thing—

or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial,

Then the court has the power to fix a new rate. Now, if I live in Buffalo and I come before that court and say you charge me for taking a carload of wheat from Buffalo to New York the same price that you charge a man for bringing a carload of wheat from Chicago, and that is unduly preferential, why has not that court jurisdiction to pass upon it, why can not it say under the wording of this, "It is unjust that you, living within 600 miles of New York, should pay what is charged to another man whose freight is hauled 2,000 miles from New York," and therefore fix a new rate for me?

Well, if they have the power, Mr. Chairman, there I certainly should fear possibly great evils. The question of the rate for one shipper may be regulated without much trouble; but when you come to a conflict between localities, how will they be decided? As I said before, the railroad that runs its road to South Dakota, to Nebraska, to Kansas City has got to do one thing, namely, to furnish a rate by which the business of Nebraska or South Dakota or Kansas City can be built up and sustained. But let us suppose that this bill had been passed forty years ago. The farmers of western New York then were much greater wheat farmers than they are now. They were only four or five hundred miles from the New York market. A new road pushing out into Indiana or Ohio, or a few years later into Kansas or Nebraska, brought wheat into New York City at rates that crippled that industry in western New York. In those days when the Representatives from New York were far more numerous in proportion to the West than they are now, does anyone believe they would not have gone before the Commission with their complaints? They could not go to a railroad, because the railroad would say, "We are going to bring that freight in at prices that will build up the business, for otherwise we will have no business to do," and, therefore, to appeal to them was useless. Now there is a railroad commission. They may be fair men; doubtless they are. They may be just men, but they are politicians like all of the rest of us, and they are subject to influences like all the rest of us. The Interstate Commerce Commission time and time again has intimated at least its willingness to consider the natural advantages to which people were entitled as bearing on the question of rates. There is no greater natural advantage, for instance, than for the person who has to send his goods to the seaboard to be near the seaboard. Does anyone believe—does my acute and distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] believe—that if this law had been enforced forty years ago the Representatives from western New York would have gone before the Commission and said it was unjust, because it was unduly preferential that wheat or any other stuff should be hauled five times the distance for perhaps only 5 per cent more in cost and in some cases none at all? They would have said that we were entitled to the legitimate advantages of our situation; that the rate should be fixed with just regard to the length of the haul. Contests between different localities—the contest between rival localities—in those matters have been little found in this country, because there was no court before which they could be presented. In France and in Germany, under government management, subject to the influences of government control—unless we have been told wrongly by all those who have made it a study—the building up of new interests, the development of new localities, certainly has not been carried on with any such rapidity as forms a part of the extraordinary commercial history and the extraordinarily rapid development of the business interests in our new territories of the United States of America.

Mr. Chairman, as I said in opening, it is unpleasant when everybody predicts great advantages from this bill to even suggest doubt as to its operation. But this thing is sure, for such questions as arise as to differentials, for the questions that arise in any new business development, what is most required is infinite flexibility, the ability to change, the ability to modify, the ability to meet the situation. Is there anybody who does not know that in every Government department, in every branch of the Government, fixity, fixed rules, the inability to change is found from the smallest clerk up to the highest official? This is sure to be in Government action controlled by Government laws. Red tape winds around every governmental action, just as sure as the Fates are weaving their threads around all of us every day. It is inevitably so. It seems to me to some extent that in questions which require great flexibility of action we are seeking to substitute the inflexibility of Government control, and whether that will bring more good than it brings harm only the future can say. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VREELAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12987—the railroad rate bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

CARNEGIE FOUNDATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF TEACHING.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13538) to incorporate The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

Be it enacted, etc., That the persons following, being the persons who are now trustees of the Carnegie Foundation, a corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, namely, Arthur T.
